bi-chlōr'-īde, s. [Lat. prefix bi = two, and chloride (q.v.).]

Chem.: A term used in chemistry to denote a compound containing two atoms of chlorine, which are united to an atom of an element as $HgCl_2$ (bichloride of mercury), or to an organic radical, as $(C_2H_4)''Cl_2$ (ethylene bichloride). These are usually called dichlorides, as ethylene dichloride.

bichloride of gold.
A compound of chlorine and gold supposed to be contained in the subcutaneous injection advocated by some for the cure of inebriate.

bichloride of mercury.
Phar.: $HgCl_2$, also called perchloride of mercury, or corrosive sublimate. It is prepared by heating a mixture of mercuric sulphate, $HgSO_4$, with dry chloride of sodium, NaCl, and black oxide of manganese, MnO: the corrosive sublimate sublimes; hence its name. Bichloride of mercury occurs in heavy white masses of prismatic crystals. It is soluble in twenty parts of cold water, also in alcohol and ether. (For tests see MOSCHATUS.) It is a very powerful irritant—when taken in large doses it causes vomiting and purging. It is very poisonous; the best antidote is white of egg. It corrodes the skin; it is employed in very small doses as an alterative in skin diseases, externally as a lotion, injection, or gargle in chronic skin diseases, ulcerated sore throats, and chronic discharge from the mucous membranes. $HgCl_2$ is a powerful antiseptic; it is used to preserve anatomical preparations. Ammonia added to $HgCl_2$ throws down white precipitate NH_2HgCl, which is used in pharmacy in the form of ointment.

2. spec.: A fight carried on with stones (Scotch.) A term used among schoolboys.

"Bickers were formerly held on the Calton hill, Edinburgh, every evening a little before dark. In these encounters idle boys, chiefly apprentices, simply threw stones at each other." (Campbell: Journey.)

3. A short race. (Scotch. Used chiefly in Ayrshire.)

"The leeward whyles, against my will,
I took a bicker."
Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.

bick-er (2), † bi-queur, s. [Gael. bicir = a small wooden dish.] A wooden vessel made [illegible] for holding liquor, brose, &c. (Jam.)

". . . and tell Peggy to gi' ye a bicker o' brash . . ."
—Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian, ch. v.

bick-er-er, s. [Eng. bicker, -er.] A skirmisher (Shelton).

bick-er-fu', s. [Scotch bicker and fu' = Eng. full.] As much of any thing, whether dry or liquid, as fills a bicker.

"[illegible] degree better than a head-queen it cannot get but a bickerfu' of meal in a quarter of an hour." (Scott: Pirate, ch. xi.

bick-er-ing, bik-er-ing, bik-ker-inge, by-ker-ynge, pr. par., s., & a.

A. As pr. par. In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As participial adj. (chiefly of things): Moving rapidly, with or without a certain amount of noise. (Lord.) bid (1),  bidde (1),  bid'-den, * bede, * byd'-den, * bed'-den, * bede, * byd'-den, v.t. [A.S. biddan, imp. bide, pa. par. beden = (1) to ask, pray, intreat, or beseech; (2) to bid, declare, command, demand, require, enforce, compel (Bosworth.) A.S and O.S. biddian = to pray; O. Icel. bidja, beithe = to pray; Dut. bidden = to pray; (N.H.) Ger. bitten = (1) to request, to ask; (2) to ask, to invite; O.H Ger. bitjan; Goth. bidjan, bidan. Compare Lat peto = . . . to beg, beseech, ask. Though Bosworth gives command as one of the secondary significations of A.S. biddan, yet, as the common A.S. word for command is beodan, and there are similar duplicate terms in the other Teutonic languages, we follow Wedgwood and Skeat in separating this bid from the one which follows.] [BID (2).]

1. To pray, to ask, to entreat

"Alle he folken him thoo to bed To lethen mothe and bidden an."
Story of Ian and Emel., 2027-9.

". . . Lord, undigne and unworthy
I am to thilk honour that ye me wole."
Chaucer C. T., 635-6.

¶ To bid beads or bedes:

1. Originally: To pray prayers with or without a rosary to count them upon.

2. Subsequently: To count the beads of a rosary, each bead dropped passing for a prayer. (Nares.) [BEAD, BEDE, BEDDING.]

"Pitt Eustace, you with Lady Clare May out your beads and patter prayer."
Ingoldsby Legends, Hermitage, vi. 97.

2. To care for, to value (Scotch.)

"As to the first [i.e. now bid I not to recall Without [i.e. But] . . . the is well behaved Nor I bid not to [i.e. do and wyth are Lindsay: Tragedy, 149, 16. (Jamieson.) bid-prayer, s. [BIDDING-PRAYER.]

bid (2),  bidde (2),  byd, * bide, * bede (pret. bade, bid,  bad*,  badde*; pa. par. bid, bidden,  bydden*), v.t. [A.S. beodan, pret. bead, pa. par bodan = to command, order, bid, will, offer, enjoy. (Bosworth.) In Icel. bjoda; Sw. bjuda = to bid, to command; Dan. byde, bød = to offer, to invite; Dut. bieden, gebieden = to offer, to tender; Ger. bieten = to offer, tender, present; gebieten = to command, to order. O.H Ger. biuten, biotan; Goth. biudan.]

1. To command, to order, to enjoin

(a) Literally:

". . . stack not thy riding for me except I bid thee
—2 Kings iv. 24.

(b) Figuratively:

"For his was not that open artless soul That feels no guile to bid a thought conceal."
Byron: Childe Harold, I. 8.

2. To invite, to ask, to request to come to a feast, a party, or anything social

". . . as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage
—Matt. xxii. 9.

3. To announce, to declare.

(1) Publicly:

Spec.: To proclaim, to announce by means of a public functionary, or at least publicly

(a) In a favourable sense: To announce to friends and the public.

¶ To bid one's banns: To announce one's banns.

"Our banns thrice bid / and for our wedding day My husband bought / linen gown'd, then fees'd me a lady"

(b) In an unfavourable sense: To denounce, to proclaim publicly with hostile feeling or intent.

"Thyself and Oxford, with five thousand men, Shall cross the seas, and bid false Edward battle."
Shakesp. Hen. VI., iii. 3.

¶ Thus it is often used in the phrase to bid defiance to, meaning to defy openly "Of matters arms, unattainable, and proud,

He bids defiance to the gaping crowd."
Dryden's Ovid.

(2) Privately: To declare, to pronounce in the domestic circle.

". . . pray you, bid
These unknown friends to 's welcome."
Shakesp. Wint. Tale, iv. 3.

¶ Probably such phrases as "to bid one God speed" (2 John 10), and "to bid one farewell" (Acts xviii. 21), are a modification of this meaning, though the opinion of Johnson is worth consideration that they mean to pray God that one may speed well, to pray that one may fare well, in which case the verb bid is No. 1, and not No. 3.

4. To offer, to make a tender; to announce what price one is prepared to give for a specified article. (Used especially in connection with auctions.) (Lit. & fig.)

"To give interest a share in friendship, is to sell it by inch of candle, he that bids most shall have it. —Colton: Friendship.

¶ (a) To bid fair (fig.): To offer a fair prospect; to afford a probability of; to have a well-grounded hope.

"And Jupiter bids fair to rule again."
Congreve: Consecration.

(b) To bid high: To offer a high price for anything at a real or imaginary auction.

"And each bade high to win him to their side."
Granville.

bid, bid-den, pa. par. [BID.]

biddery-ware, s.

Comm.: An alloy made at Bidddery or Bidar. Dr Heyne states its proportions as—Copper, 8; lead, 4; tin, 1. To three ounces of this alloy sixteen ounces of zinc are added when the alloy is melted for use. It is coloured by dipping into a solution of sal-ammoniac, saltpetre, common salt, and sulphate of copper. This colours it, and the colour forms a ground for the silver and gold inlay. &c. Chisels and gravers are employed, and after the inlaying is complete, the ware is polished and stained. Another formula gives, zinc 128, copper 16, lead 4, tin 2. (Knight, &c.) bid'-ding (1),  bid'-dinge, * byd'-dyng, * byd'-dyn, pr. par. [BID (1), v.]

A. As present participle: in senses corresponding to those of the verb

B. As substantive: The act of praying, specially with a rosary of beads

"Beddynge or prayenge oracio . . . oratus." Prompt. Parv.

¶ Bidding prayer:

Eccles.: An expression used in pre-Reformation times in the sense of "praying prayers" (i.e., praying. In the mediæval church the priest was accustomed to read out a list of persons and things for which the prayers of the faithful were requested. In Anglican the sixteenth century, this list was replaced by a form setting forth the subjects to be remembered by the people when bidding their beads (that is, saying the rosary, in other words, saying their prayers, or praying. When the two verbs [BID (1), BID (2)] were popularly confounded the original meaning of the phrase was lost sight of, and bidding was taken as an adjective = that enjoins or commands. Bidding prayer then came to mean "an exhortation to intercessory prayer." It is no used by some Roman writers (cf. Anglican Church of Our Fathers, ii. 254). In the English Church the bidding prayer is an invitation to the people to pray for the Royal Family, Parliament, &c. It is said before the sermon at visitations, assizes, and ordinations, and before the university sermons, and is followed by the Lord's Prayer.

big-am-ist, s. [O. Eng. bigam; -ist; or Eng. bigam(y); -ist; or Lat. bigamus; with Eng. suffix -ist.]

A. As a man: One who commits bigamy, one who marries a second wife before the death of the first.

"By the canons a clergyman that has a wife cannot have an ecclesiastical benefice; much less can a bigamist have such a benefice according to that law."—Ayliffe.

B. As a woman: A woman who marries a second husband while the first one lives.

big-am-ous, a. [From Latin bigamus.] [Bigam.] Pertaining to bigamy; involving the commission of bigamy, as "a bigamous marriage."

 big-am-ūs, s. [Bigam.]

big-am-y, * big-am-ie, s. [Fr. bigamie; Sp., Port., Ital., & Low Lat. bigamia.] [Bigam.]

A. Ordinary Language:

1. Formerly. (Generally.) In the elum. sense: The wedding of two women in succession, marrying twice. [B. 1.]

"Which is a plain proufe yt concerning ye prohibicion of any mo wives then one and the forbadding of bigamy ly3e wedding of one wife after another, was the special ordinance of God and not of Saint Poule."—Sir T. More: Workes, p. 229.

2. Now. (Specially): The marrying of another woman while the first wife is still living, or of a man while the first husband still lives. [B. II.]

"He settled in a third parish, and was taken up for bigamy."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

B. Law:

I. Canon Law:

1. The marrying of two virgins, one after the other, the sin or crime being held to be committed even if the first had died before the second was wedded.

2. The marrying of a widow.

3. The marrying of a woman who, though not ceremonially wedded, has still allowed some one to have intercourse with her. If bigamy of any of these kinds were committed, the offender could not take holy orders.

II. Common Law: The act of marrying a second time, while the first husband or wife is still known to be living. By 5 Edward I., passed in 1276, it was punished with death. In 1603, during the reign of James I., it was made felony, without benefit of clergy. By 35 Geo. III., passed in 1794, the capital penalty was modified into imprisonment or transportation. If a person marry a third wife, while the first two are living, the offence is still called bigamy. In the United States bigamy is everywhere treated as crime, punishable by fine and imprisonment, differing in the different states.

¶ Digamy signifies simply a second marriage, bigamy implies that such a marriage takes place whilst the first wife is still alive. [Digamy.]

big-nō'-nĭ-ę, s. [In Fr. bignone; Dut., Sp., Port., & Ital. bignonia. Named after Abbé Bignon, librarian to Louis XIV., and patron of the botanist Tournefort.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, that of the trumpet flowers, constituting the typical one of the order Bignoniaceæ or Bignoniads. It has four perfect stamens, two long and two short. The species, which are numerous, are nearly all of an ornamental character, owing to their fine large trumpet-like monopetalous corollas, colored red, blue, yellow, or white. They are trees or shrubs, in the latter case often climbing; found in or sometimes even beyond the tropics of both hemispheres, and constituting a feature in the flora of the regions which they inhabit. Many are from the warmer parts of America; India also has various species. One of the latter, the Bignonia Indica, called in the Bombay presidency Taetoo, has supra-decompound leaves, from four to six feet long, panicles of flowers about five to six feet long, and legume-like capsules more than two feet long by three and a half inches broad. Several bignonias have been introduced into the hot-houses and greenhouses of this country, and one—the Bignonia radicans—will grow in the open air. It is a beautiful climber with rooting-joints, which enable it to adhere to walls.

big-nō-nĭ-ā'-cē-æ (R. Brown, Lindley, &c.), bignonias (Jussieu) (both Latin), big-nō'-nĭ-ăds (Eng.), s. [BIGNONIA.]

Bot.: An order of plants, ranked by Dr. Lindley as the type of his Bignonial Alliance. The stamens are five, but always one and sometimes three are abortive, so as to make the species tetradynamous or diandrous plants. The ovary is two or spuriously four-celled and polyspermous. The capsule is two-celled, and sometimes so long as to appear like a legume. The inflorescence, which is terminal, is generally somewhat panicled. The leaves are mostly compound. The bignoniads are trees or shrubs, as a rule climbing. They are highly ornamental plants from the tropics of both hemispheres. The known species number about 500.

big-nō'-nĭ-ăl, a. [From Low Lat. bignoniales = pertaining to the Bignonia (q.v.).]

Bot.: Pertaining to the Bignonia genus.

Bignonial Alliance: An alliance of plants. [BIGNONIALES.]

big-nō-nĭ-ā'-lēş, s. pl. [Plural of Low Lat. bignoniales = pertaining to the Bignonia (q.v.).]

Botany. The Bignonial Alliance: Lindley's forty-ninth alliance of plants. It is ranged under his sub-class Perigynæ, as Exogens, and includes the orders Pedaliaceæ, Gesneraceæ, Crescentiaceæ, Bignoniaceæ, Acanthaceæ, Scrophulariaceæ, and Lentibulariaceæ (q.v.).

• bi-gold, s. [From A.S. bi = . . near to (?); and Eng gold, referring to the yellow hue of the corolla.] [MARIGOLD.] An obsolete name for a plant Chrysanthemum segetum, the Corn Marigold or Yellow Ox-eye. (Gerarde.)

† big'-ŏn-ĕt, s. [BIGGONET.]

• bi-goon', pa. par. [BEGONE.] (Chaucer.)

big-ŏt, s. & a. [In Dan. † bigot (s.); Ger. bigott (a.); Fr. bigot (the modern sense of the word not arising till the fifteenth century); Low Lat. bigoti, pl. A word for which a superfluity of etymologies have been given. It is deeply rooted only in the English and French tongues. Barbazan, Malone, and Michel consider it a corruption of the word Visigoth, which might become Visigot, bigot, Bigot, a view which Littre thinks probable. According to an old chronicle quoted by Du Cange, Rollo, the first Duke of Normandy, being required to kiss the foot of King Charles, as having received Neustria as a fief, contemptuously replied, "Ne se Bigot" = Not so, by God. Hence the king and court nicknamed him Bigoth. Littre, however, thinks it probable that this story was invented to explain the word. Wace, as quoted by Du Cange, says that the French called the Normans bigoz or bigos. Cotgrave affirms that bigot is an old Norman word = for God's sake. Bullokar (ed. 1556) thus defines it: "bigot, an hypocrite; also a scrupulous or superstitious person. The word came into England out of Normandy, where it continues to be to-day in that sense." Trench derives the word from Sp. bigote = a mustachio, and supposes that the people of that nation, wearing on their lips the hirsute appendages now spoken of, while the other nations of Europe had smooth faces, came to be called bigots, from one of the mustachio. Standing afterwards as the type of religious intolerance, they degraded the word bigot that it came to have its present meaning. (Trench, on the Study of Words, 2nd ed., pp. 80—82.) A number of authors derive bigot from the Franciscan tertiaries called Beguttæ, Biguttæ, Beguini, beguins, or in Ital. Bizochi, the latter-named word being from bigio = russet-grey, brown, which was the color of the habit they wore. To this view Wedgwood assents, while Skeat considers that Wace's statement given above indicates the correct etymology. He believes bigoz or bigos to be of Scandinavian origin, though its modern signification has come from its application to the Beguins or Beguttæ. [BEGUIN, BEGUTTÆ.]

A. As substantive:

1. A person unreasonably wedded to his own opinions on religious or other matters and disposed to think hardly of, and if opportunity arise, to persecute those whose views differ from his own.

"His theological writings, though too moderate to be pleasing to the bigots of any party, had an immense reputation."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. iv.

bil'-bēr-rȳ, s. & a. [Of uncertain origin. Dr. Murray thinks that it is Norse, and suggests comparison with Dan. bollebær = the bilberry, for which the first element bolle is also used as an independent word.]

A. As substantive:

1. The name given to one or two species of Vaccinium, a genus of plants belonging to the order Vaccinieæ (Cranberries). It is especially used of the Vaccinium Myrtillus, called also the Whortleberry. It has angular stems drooping, urceolate, almost waxy flowers, greenish with a red tinge, and black berries very pleasant to the taste. It grows in woods and heathy places. The Great Bilberry or Bog Whortleberry is an allied species with rounded stems, smaller flowers, and less agreeably-tasted fruit. It grows in mountain bogs. It is called also the Bleaberry or Blaeberry.

2. The fruit of the species described under No. 1. That of the Bilberry properly so called is eaten in the places where it grows, either as it is or with milk. It is made also into jellies and tarts. It is astringent, and may be used in diarrhœa and dysentery. The fruit of the V. uliginosum is acid, and produces giddiness and headache when eaten in too large quantity.

"... as blue as bilberry."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, v. 5.

A. As substantive:

1. (Sing.): A flexible-bladed cutlass from Bilboa.

"To be compassed like a good bilbo, in the circumference of a peck, hilt to point, heel to head."—Shakesp.: Mer. Wives, iii. 5.

2. (Plur.) Bilboes, • bil-boes: A kind of fetters for prisoners, also from Bilboa, where they were manufactured in large quantities, to be shipped on board the Spanish Armada for use upon the English sailors after these should be vanquished and captured. They would be available also against insubordinate members of the Spanish crews. They consisted of a long bar of iron bolted and locked to the deck; on this bar a shackle slipped loosely, and was secured to the ankle of the prisoner.

"... methought I lay Worse than the mutines in the bilboes."
Shakesp.: Hamlet, v. 2.

B. As adjective (of the form bilbo): Pertaining to the cutlass described under A. 1, or to Bilboa, whence it came.

"Nor silbo steel, nor brasse from Corinth fet."

1. A bill, a beak.

2. The iron handle of a bucket.

• bile (2), s. [BOIL.] (Shakesp., &c.) bile, s. & a. [In Dan. byld; Fr. & Port. bile; Sp. & Lat. bilis = bile; Lat. fel = the gall bladder, gall, bile.]

A. As substantive:

1. Physiol. & Ord. Lang.: An animal fluid secreted by the liver. It is made from venous and not from arterial blood. It is a viscid transparent liquid of a very deep yellow or greenish colour, darkening by exposure to the air. Its odour is disagreeable; its taste nauseous and bitter. It has an alkaline reaction. Strecker has shown that it is essentially a mixture of two acids, the glycocholic and the taurocholic acid, the first containing nitrogen without sulphur, and the latter having both. The principal colouring matter of the bile is called bilirubin or cholepyrrhin. In 1,000 parts it contains—

Water	from	823	to	908 parts.
Solid matter ...	,,	177	to	92 ,,
Bile-acids with alkali ...	,,	108	to	56 ,,
Fat and cholesterin ...	,,	47	to	40 ,,
Mucus and colouring matter	,,	24	to	15 ,,
Ash	,,	11	to	6 ,,

When the bile is elaborated in the liver, it is received from the secreting vessels by very minute tubes, which uniting form the hepatic duct. The bile is conveyed into the gall-bladder by means of the cystic, or into the duodenum by the choledoch duct; that which makes its way into the former receptacle is called the cystic bile, and that which enters the latter the hepatic bile. Cystic bile is deeper in colour and more viscid, pungent, and bitter than hepatic bile. One main use of bile is to convert chyme into chyle as one step in the process of digestion.

"In its progression, soon the labour'd chyle Receives the confluent rills of bitter bile;
Which, by the liver sever'd from the blood,
And striving through the gall pips, here unload
Their yellow streams."
Blackmore.

2. Fig.: Anger; choler.

B. As adjective: Containing bile; in any way pertaining to bile.

bile-duct, s. [Eng. bile; duct. Or from Lat. bilis = bile, and ductus = a leading, a conducting; duco = to lead, to conduct.]

Physiol.: A duct, passage, or vessel for the conveyance of bile.

bile pigment, bile-pigment, s.

Physiol.: Colouring matter existing in the bile. This consists chiefly of Bilirubin (q.v.). On heating an alkaline solution containing bile with nitric acid a green colour is formed, which changes into blue, violet, red, and lastly to yellow. It is called also Cholepyrrhine. Another bile pigment is Biliverdin.

A. Intrans.: To spring a leak; to let in water. (Skinner.)

B. Trans.: To cause a ship to have her bilge broken in, so that she springs a leak. (Skinner.)

bilged, pa. par. & a. [BILGE, v.t.]

bil-gét, a. [BULGE.] Bulged, jutting out. (Scotch.)

"In large, or bilget bellinger, ouer se."
Doug., Virgil, 44, 39. (Jamieson.)

bil-ging, pr. par. [BILGE, v.]

bil-i-a-ry, a. [In Fr. biliaire; Port. & Ital. biliario.] Pertaining to the bile.

"In this way also, urea, lithic acid, and biliary matters are excreted."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., Vol. i. Introd., p. 12.

biliary duct, s. The same as bile-duct (q.v.).

"Voracious animals, and such as do not chew, have a great quantity of gall: and some of them have the biliary duct inserted into the pylorus."—Arbuthnot.

bil-i-á-tion, s. [Eng. bile; -ation.] The excretion of bile. (Dunglison.) bi-li-bre (pl. bi-li bris), s. [From Lat. bilibra = two pounds, prefix bi = two, and libra = a pound.] A weight of two pounds.

"A bilibre of wheete for a peny, and thre bilibris of bark for a peny."—Wycliffe (Purvey), Rev. vi. 6.

 bi lie,  bileoyen (pa. par. biloyen) [The same as BELIE (q.v.).] (Piers Plowman, bk. v., 414.) (Stratmann.)

bil-i-fus-cin, s. [From Lat. bilis = bile, and fuscus.]

Chem.: Bilifuscin $C_{16}H_{20}N_2O_4$. It is a dark-green mass, dissolving in alkalies and in alcohol, with a brown colour. It is insoluble in water and in chloroform; it occurs in biliary calculi.

 bi-ligh te, v.t. [From A.S. pref. ge, & leohtan, lyhtan = to enlighten.] To light, to illumine. (O. Eng. Hom.) bi-lim-bi, bi lim-bing, s. [The Malay name of a plant.] The fruit of the Averrhoa bilimbi, a Moluccs and Ceylonese tree, belonging to the order Oxalidaceæ (Oxalids). The fruit is of oblong form, and obtusely angled. It possesses an agreeable acid flavour, and is sold in Indian bazaars. The tree is a small one, with pinnate leaves. [AVERRHOA.]

 bi-lime,  bi-lim-ien, v.t. [A.S. pref. bi, and lim = a limb.] To dismember. (Arthur and Merlin, 5,775.) (Stratmann.)

 bi-lim-pen (pret. bilamp; pr. par. bilumpen), v.i. [A.S. belimpan = to concern, regard, . . . happen; bilimp, gelimp = an event.] To happen. (Ormulum.) (Stratmann.)

bi-lin, s. [In Fr. biline; from Lat. bilis = bile.]

Chem.: $C_{26}H_{43}NSO_7$. It is also called Taurocholic Acid. It is obtained from ox-bile, the glycocholic acid, mucus and colouring matters being first precipitated by neutral lead acetate; the basic lead acetate is added, which precipitates lead taurocholate, which is decomposed by H_2S, and the free acid separates in needle crystals, which, when heated with water, are resolved into cholic acid and taurine.

bi-lin-é-ar, a. [Pref. bi = two, and Eng. linear (q.v.).] Composed of or relating to two lines.

 bil-ligs-gate, s. [BILLINGSGATE.]

bi-lin-gual (u as w), a. [In Fr. bilingue = in two languages; Ital bilingue = two-tongued; from Lat. bilinguis = two-tongued, prefix bi = two, and lingua = the tongue, speech, language; suffix -al.]

1. Of persons: Speaking two languages. (Gent. Mag.)

2. Of things: Written in two languages.

"A bilingual tablet."—Trans. Bib. Arch. Soc., iii. 466.

† bi lin-gu-ar (u as w), a. [From Lat. bilingu(is), and Eng. suffix -ar.] [BILINGUAL.] In two languages.

bi-lin-gu-ist (u as w), s. [From Lat. bilingu(is), and Eng. suffix -ist.] [BILINGUAL.] One who speaks two languages. (Hamilton.) bi-lin-gu-ous (u as w), a. [From Lat. bilingu(is), and Eng. suff. -ous.] [BILINGUAL.] Speaking two languages. (Johnson.)

bil-i-ous, a. [In Fr. bilieux; Sp., Port., & Ital. bilioso; from Lat. biliosus = full of bile; Lat. bilus = gall, bile.]

1. Lit.: Pertaining to bile, consisting of or containing bile; produced to a greater or less extent by bile; affected by bile.

"Why bilious juice a golden light puts on,
And floods of chyle in silver currents run."
Garth: Dispensary, i. 40.

2. Fig.: Choleric in temper for the moment or permanently; passionate.

bil-i-ous-ness, s. [Eng. bilious; -ness.] The quality of being affected by bile.

"... cure costiveness, headache, and biliousness."—Adv. in Times, 11th N.*, 1875.

 bi-lim-pen, v.t. To deprive of by fraud.

"Sulen adam bilirren of hise lif."
Story of Gen. and Exod., 316.

bil-i-rú-bin, s. [From Lat. bilis = bile; ruber = red; and suffix -in.]

Chem.: Bilirubin, $C_{16}H_{18}N_2O_3$, forms the chief part of the colouring matter of the bile. It is insoluble in water, sparingly soluble in alcohol and ether, but readily soluble in chloroform and carbon disulphide. It dissolves in alkalies, forming an orange solution, which, on exposure to the air, turns green; on the addition of an acid it gives a green precipitate of biliverdin, $C_{16}H_{18}N_2O_5$, which crystallises out of glacial acetic acid in green rhombic plates.

bi-lit-ér-al, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and literalis = pertaining to letters or writing; litera = a letter.]

Philol., &c.: Consisting of two letters.

"§ 455. Biliteral roots: From some appearances in the Hebrew language, it is probable that originally it contained a greater number of biliteral roots than at present."—Monro Stuart: Heb. Gram. (ed. 1838), p. 77.

 bi-live, * bi-leven (pret.  bilif*,  bilief*), v.i. [A.S. belifan = to remain.] To remain. (Ælfric: Antiq.) [BELEAVE.]

 bi-live, * bi-leve, * bi leave, s. [A.S. bigleofa = food; O. H. Ger. bilibi.] Living, sustenance. (Piers Ploreman, bk. xix., 430.) (Strathmann.)

 bi-live, * bi-lē've, * bȳ-live, * blive, adv. [BELIVE.]

"And down to Philtie's house are come blive."
Spenser: F. Q., I. v. 12.

bi-li-vĕr-din, s. [From Eng. bile, verd(ant), and suffix -in.] [BILIRUBIN.]

bilk, v.t. [Of uncertain origin. This form probably arose from a mincing pronunciation of balk, a technical term at cribbage, with which bilk was afterwards interchanged. (N.E.D.)]

1. With a person for the object:

(1) To cheat a person, to "make a fool" of him by swindling him or in some similar way.

"They never bilk'd the poet of his pay."
Churchill: Independence.

(2) To leave in the lurch, to abandon deceitfully.

"... an unknown country-girl was delivered of him under a tree, where she bilk'd him, he was found by a sexton priest of the church."—Spencer Transl. of the Rec. Hist. of the Hirnes of Matrices (1686), p. 469.

2. With a thing for the object:

(1) Of a debt: Fraudulently to evade payment of.

"He cannot drink five bottles, bilk the score, Then kill a constable, and drink five more."
Cowper: Progress of Error.

(2) Of hope: To disappoint. [See BILKED, 2 ex.]

bilk, * bilke, s. [BILK, v.]

1. A cheat, a fraud, a swindle.

"A gallant bilk . . ."
Halliwell (contr. to Lansteg): Ballad.

2. Nothing.

"Tub. Hee will ha' the last word, though he take bilke for it.
Hugh. Bilke! what's that?
Tub. Why, nothing; a word signifying nothing, and borrowed here to express nothing."
Ben Jonson: Tale of a Tub, i. 1.

bilk-ed, pa. par. & a. [BILK, v.] Used—

(1) Of a person cheated.

"Bilk'd stationers for yeomen stood prepared."
Dryden.

(2) Of hope: Disappointed.

"What comedy, what farce can more delight,
Than grinding hunger, and the pleasing sight
Of your bilk'd hopes?"
Dryden.

bilk-ing, pr. par. [BILK, v.]

bill (1),  billie, * bylle, * bil, * bile, s. [A.S. bil, bill = (1) any instrument or weapon made of steel, as an axe, hoe, bill, falchion, sword; (2) a bill, beak, or nib of a bird, a proboscis, horn, fore-part of a ship (Isaworth). In O. S. = a sword; Sw bila = an axe, bill = a ploughshare; Icel. bildr, bilda = an axe; Dut. bijl = an axe, hatchet, a bill; (N.H.) Ger. beil = an axe, a hatchet, a bill; M. H. Ger. bil, bile, bilhel; O. H. Ger. bille, bial, bihel. Compare Sans. bhid = to split.]

A. Of the forms bill, * bille, and * bile:

1. The beak of a bird, or other animal consisting of two mandibles.

BILL OF A BIRD.

(a) c. bird:

"... so that when they are ruffled or disordered, the bird, with her bill, can easily preen them."
Ray: Wisdom of God in Creation (ed. 17th), p. 148.

¶ In the figure (a) is the upper mandible, (b) the lower one, (c, d) the commissure formed by the meeting of the mandibles, (d) the tip, point, or apex of the bill, (a, e) the ridge (culmen) of the upper mandible, (f) a nostril, (b, g) the keel (gonys) of the lower mandible; (a, f, e, g, c), the fleshy sheath enveloping the base of the bill, is called a cere.

(b) Of a species of turtle:

"... in the Hawk's bill Turtle (Chelonia imbricata) ... so called from the curved and pointed form of the upper jaw, which certainly presents a very distant resemblance to the hooked bill of a predaceous bird."—Dallas: Nat. Hist., p. 449.

(c) Of a zephalopod: More generally, however, this is called not the bill, but the beak. It is sometimes found fossil. [RHYNCOLITE.]

2. The front as opposed to the back; or (adverbially) in front, not in the rear.

¶ Bok and bil: Back and front.

"... and he hewe the Sarazins bothe bak and bil: here herte blod mud they swete."—Sir Ferumb. (ed. Herrtage), 2,654.

2. The "boom" or hollow booming noise made by the bittern

"The bittern's hollow bill was heard."
Wordsworth.

B. Of the forms bill, * bil, and * bylle: This second use of the word is so rooted in the Teutonic languages as compared with the limited extent that the signification A. obtains among them, that it may be the primary one. On the other hand, it is difficult to resist the belief that such an instrument as a pick-axe was imitated from a bird's beak, in which case the relative arrangement of A. and B. would be as it is here made

1. Mechanics:

(1) A pick-axe, a mattock.

(2) The point of a hook.

2. Military:

(1) A species of halberd, consisting of a broad blade, with the cutting part hooked like a woodman's bill-hook, and with a spike both at the back and at the top. It was mounted on a staff about six feet long. It was known as a "Black Bill" from the color of the varnish used to protect it from rust, and was largely used by infantry soldiers. Out of a levy of 200 men, in 1584, for the Irish wars, one-fourth were ordered to be furnished with "good Black Bills." The armament of the Mary Rose contained as many bills as arquebuses. They were afterwards carried by sheriff's officers attending execution, and finally by watchmen. Dr. Johnson states that as late as 1778 they were used by the watchmen of Litchfield.

1. BLACK BILL.
2. HALBERD

(2) A person whose weapon is a war-bill.

"Lo, with a band of bowmen and of pikes,
Brown bills, and targiteers four hundred strong,
I come."
Edward II. (O. Pl.), ii. 308.

3. Agric.: An iron instrument with an incurvated edge, and furnished with a handle. It is used by woodmen for the purpose of lopping trees; plumbers and basket-makers also employ it in their respective vocations. When short it is called a hand-bill, and when long a hedge-bill. Both forms are sometimes termed wood-bills or fore bills.

"Standing troops are servants armed, who use the lance and sword, as other servants do the sickle or the bill, at the command of those who entertain them."—Temple.

4. Naut.: The point on the end of the arm of an anchor beyond the fluke or palm; the pee. It is the first part to penetrate the ground, and is made slightly hooked.

5. Shipwrighting: The end of a compass or knee timber.

3. Her.: Stone-bill = A wedge.

bill-board, s.

Ord. Lang.: A board used for posting advertising bills or placards.

Ship-building: An iron-covered board or double planking, which projects from the side of the ship and serves to support the inner fluke of the anchor.

bill-cock, s. One of the English names for a bird—the Water-rail (Rallus aquaticus)

Ichthy.: A fish (Belone truncata) found on the coast of North America.

bill-head, s.

Her.: The head of a bill, whether a woodbill or a war-bill. It is more frequently borne on a charge than the entire instrument.

bill-hook, s.

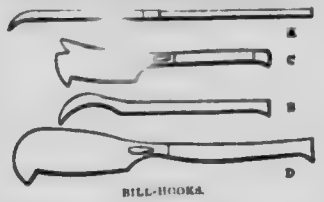
Agric. Implem.: A thick, heavy knife with a hooked end, useful for chopping off small branches of trees or cutting apart entangled vines, roots, &c. When a short handle only is attached, this implement is sometimes called a hand-bill

¶ A long-handled bill (A in the Fig.) is sometimes called a scimitar; it has a handle about four feet long

A short-handled, light-tool bill (B in the Fig.), is called a dress-hook, and is used for trimming off twigs, pruning or cutting back the smaller limbs to preserve the shape of a hedge, shrub, or ornamental tree

Other forms of the implement are C and D.



BILL-HOOKS.

bill (2), s. A bull. (Scotch.)

"As yeld's the bill."
Burns Address to the Deil.

bill (3), * billa, * bil, * byl, s. & a. [In Ger bill = only a parliamentary bill, evidently borrowed from Eng. In Fr. and Port. bill; O. Fr. bille = a Label, noting the value of anything; Low Lat. billa = a seal, stamp, edict, or roll. Some writers bring the Eng. bill from the Low Lat. billa. Littre reverses the process, and derives Low Lat. billa, from Eng. bill; Prov. bulla, bolla = a round piece of metal marked with a seal; Ital. balla = a seal, a stamp; bolla = (1) a bubble, a blister, a pimple; (2) a stamp, a seal, a Pope's bull; Class. Lat. bulla = (1) a bubble, (2) a boss, knob, or stud upon a door, girdle, &c.; (3) a boss worn upon the neck of free-born children.] (BILLET, BULL (2), BULLETIN.)

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Originally: A sealed instrument. (Weigand.) A formal, solemn, and public document, presumably sealed; or, specially—

(1) A document formally drawn out and presumably sealed, in which complaint is made against a person in a law-court or elsewhere. [Law: Bill of Indictment.]

"As doth me right upon this pitous bill,
In which I plaine upon Virginius
And if that he will say that it is not thus,
I wol it prove, and finden good witnesse,
That soth is that my bille wol expresse."
Chaucer C. T., 12,100—4. (Richardson.)

* (2) A petition.

"This bill putteth he fourth in ye pore beggar's name."—Sir Thos. More: Workes, p. 302. (Richardson.)

(3) A bond or contract under which one has come to pay a certain sum of money or other property.

"So he [the unjust steward] called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? And he said, An hundred measures of oil. . . . And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty."—Luke xvi. 5, 6 (see also ver. 7)

(4) A Jewish letter of divorce. [B. I. 1.]

". . . let him write her a bill of divorcement . . ."—Deut. xxiv. 1.

* 2. A small billet, written or printed, as, for instance, a fragment of paper, card, or other material, inscribed with a name, to be used as a lottery ticket.

". . . in writing of those billes or names for the lottery."—Holland: Plutarch, p. 157. (Richardson.)

3. A written or printed document issued for the public information.

(1) A printed broadsheet given away by hand or affixed to some public place, to serve for an advertisement. Now, the best-known form of such a document is a theatric playbill.

"And in despair, their empty pit to fill, Set up some foreign monster in a bill." Dryden.

(2) A bill of fare: A written or printed paper, enumerating the several dishes at a dinner-table; or, in the case of hotels and public eating-houses, enumerating the prices of the several articles which may be ordered for meals. (Lat. de gg.)

"It may seem somewhat difficult to make out the bills of fare for some of the tormentor-men suppers."—Arbuthnot.

4. The draft of an Act of Congress or Parliament submitted to the legislature for discussion, or an Act which has been passed into a law. [B., III.]

(a) The draft

"The bill went smoothly through the first stages."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

(b) The Act itself.

"There will be no way left for me to tell you that I remember you, and that I love you, but that one which needs no open warrant, or secret conveyance, which no bille can preclude, nor no kinde prevent."—Atterbury.

5. A weekly record of mortality. [B. V.]

"So liv'd our sires, ere doctors learned to kill,
And multiply'd with theirs the weekly bill."
Dryden.

6. A physician's prescription.

"Like him that took the doctor's bill
And swallow'd it instead of the pill."
Hudibras.

7. An account specifying the items which the recipient owes, with the prices of each, and summing up the whole.

"Anticipated rents and bills unpaid Force many a shining youth into the shade."
Cowper Retirement.

8. A document for the transfer of money. [B. IV.]

¶ Bill of exchange:

(1) Lit. [B. IV.]

"All that a bill of exchange can do is to direct to whom money is due, or taken up upon credit, in a foreign country, shall be paid."—Locke.

(2) Fig.: Exchange of anxiety for composure through resting on the divine promises

"The comfortable sentences are bills of exchange upon the credit of which we lay our cares down, and receive provisions."—Taylor.

B. Technically:

I. Law:

1. Jewish Law. Bill of divorce or divorcement: A paper given by a husband to his wife when he had found her unchaste. The handing of this document entitled him to turn her out of his house. (Deut. xxiv. 1, Jer. iii. 8; Mark x. 4.)

2. Eng. Law: In various senses, which will be understood from the details which follow

(1) Bill of Attainder: A bill declaring that the person named in it is attainted and his property confiscated.

* (2) Bill in Chancery: A bill filed in Chancery. The same as a Bill in Equity (q. v.).

(3) Bill of Conformity: [CONFORMITY.]

(4) Bill of Costs: A bill of the charges expenditure of an attorney's solicitor in the conducting of his client's case

* (5) Bill in Equity: Formerly a petition to the Lord Chancellor for relief from some injustice or grievance for which the Common Law afforded no redress. (Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. iii., ch. 27.) Now that law and equity have been fused together this procedure no longer obtains.

(6) Bill of Exceptions: A bill of the nature of an appeal from a judge who is held to have misstated the law, whether by ignorance, by inadvertence, or by design. If the judge is bound to seal if he be requested by the counsel on either side so to do. Now few bills of exceptions are given in, the practice of asking for a new trial having become very prevalent. (Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. iii., ch. 23.)

(7) Bill of Indemnity: An Act of Parliament passed each session to grant indemnity to those who have not taken the oths required on entering certain situations

(8) Bill of Indictment: A written declaration made against one or more persons of having committed a specified crime or misdemeanour. It is preferred to and presented on oath by a grand jury. If the grand jury find the allegations unproved, they ignore the bill, giving as their verdict "Not a true bill;" if, on the contrary, they consider the indictment proved, their verdict is a "True bill," in law-Latin "billa vera." (Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. iv., ch. 23.)

(9) Bill of Middlesex (from the county of Middlesex, where the Court of King's Bench sits): A kind of capias directed by the Court of Queen's Bench to the sheriff of the county directing him to bring the body of the defendant and deliver him at Westminster to answer to a plea of trespass. The writ was then brought him into the hands of the court on some other charge (LATHAM.) (Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. iii., ch. iii.) The fictitious charge of trespass was swept away by 2 Will. IV. c. 39, and the practice in the several divisions of the High Court of Justice are now commenced by actions.

(10) Bill of Pains and Penalties: A bill inflicting pains and penalties (however of capital punishment) on persons supposed to be guilty of treason or felony, or both, though not judicially convicted of these crimes.

(11) Bill of Particulars: A writ stating a plaintiff's case, or the set off on defendant's side.

(12) Bill of Privilege: A bill designed to sue those who are privileged against arrest. [ARREST.] (Blackstone: Comment, bk. iii, ch. 19.)

(13) * Bill of Review: A bill or petition for the review of a decree in Chancery, erroneous in law or obtained in ignorance of new facts afterwards brought to light.

(14) Bill of Rights. [II. Hist.]

2. Scots Law: Every summary application by way of petition to the Court of Session. Spec.—

(1) Bill of advocation to Court of Justiciary: An application to the Commissioners of Justiciary praying that the proceedings of an inferior court in a criminal case may be advocated or brought for review to the Court of Session.

(2) Bills of Signet letters: Warrants authorising the keeper of the king's signet to affix it to certain writs

(3) Bills of suspension of Court of Justiciary: An application to the Lords of Justiciary praying them to suspend or stay the execution of a sentence passed in an inferior court in a criminal case.

II. History and Law. Bill of Rights: A bill which gave legal validity to the "claim of rights," i.e., the declaration presented by the Lords and Commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange on the 13th February, 1688, and afterwards enacted in Parliament when they became king and queen. It declared it illegal, without the sanction of Parliament, to suspend or dispense with laws, to erect commission courts, to levy money for the use of the crown, on pretence of prerogative, and to raise and maintain a standing army in the time of peace. It also declared that subjects have a right to petition the king, and, if Protestants, to carry arms for defence; also that members of Parliament ought to be freely elected, and that their proceedings ought not to be impeached or questioned in any place out of Parliament. It further enacted that excessive b[ail] ought not to be required, or excessive fines imposed, or unusual punishment inflicted; that juries should be chosen without partiality; that all grants and promises of fines or forfeitures before conviction are illegal; and that, for redress of grievances and preserving of the laws, Parliament ought to be held frequently. Finally, it provided for the settlement of the crown.

III. Parliamentary Procedure & Law: A draft of a proposed Act of Parliament, which, if it successfully pass the Houses of Commons and of Lords, and obtain the royal assent, will become law, but which will almost certainly undergo some modifications in its passage through the House, and may ultimately prove abortive. The classification of such bills is into private and public. If the relief s[ought] be of a private nature, then the House [is] moved by petition; this is gene[rally] committee to report on the [pe]tition; event of this report being [fa]vourable, leave is given to introduce a bill. [Th]is is not printed or published [in] the laws of the session. Relief [is] granted against it when it has been [ob]tained by a fraudulent statement of facts. [The] jury is bound to take notice of it, unless it be specially set forth and pleaded before them. It remains, however, enrolled among the public records of the nation. (Blackstone: Comment, bk. ii, ch. 21.)

Formerly, public bills also were drawn in the form of petitions, but since the reign of Henry VI they have been skeletons of bills in Act of Parliament form, with blanks for insertions. To pass into law, a bill must be read three times in each House of Parliament, with intervals between each reading. After the second reading, which is supposed to settle the general principle, it is referred to a committee, which, if the matter is to be discussed, may be of the whole house. [COMMITTEE.] Then the third reading of it takes place. If it has commenced, as most bills now do, in the Commons, it is then sent up to the House of Lords, to undergo the same processes there. If it begins in the House of Lords it is similarly sent down to the Commons. If when a bill has passed from the Lower to the Upper House amendments are proposed upon it by the Lords these are sent back to the Commons for concurrence. If the Commons assent to these amendments, the bill is sent back to the Lords to pass. In important bills, when the two houses cannot come to agreement about the amendments, a conference may take place between them. No bill cannot be altered by the House of [Lords]. If a bill fail at any of the stages of its progress it cannot be reintroduced again the same session. When a bill has passed through both Houses of Parliament it then, almost as a matter of course, receives the royal assent [ASSENT], after which it is called an Act of Parliament. This statement applies also to the procedure in the American Congress and Legislatures.

IV. Comm. & Law: A writing in which one man is bound to another to pay a sum of money on a future day or presently on demand, according to the agreement of the parties at the time when it is drawn; and on which, in the event of failure, execution may be summarily done to enforce payment.

(1) Bank bill. [BANK-BILL.]

"... on the forging, altering, or uttering as true when forged, of any bank-bills or notes, or other securities."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. iv, ch. 17.

(2) Bill of Adventure: A writing signed by a merchant, in which he states that certain goods shipped in his name really belong to another person, at whose risk the adventure is made

(3) Bill of Credit:

(a) Among merchants: A letter sent by an agent or other person to a merchant, desiring him to give the bearer credit for goods or money. It is frequently given to one about to travel abroad, and empowers him to take up money from the foreign correspondents of the person from whom the bill or letter of credit was received.

(b) Among governments: A paper issued by a government on its credit, and designed to circulate as money.

"... of bills of credit issued from the Exchequer."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv, ch. 17

¶ By the constitution of the United States it is provided that no state shall issue bills of credit.

(4) Bill of debt: A bill acknowledging a debt, and promising to meet it at a specified time. It is called also a bill obligatory

(5) Bill of Entry: A written account of goods entered at the custom-house, whether imported or designed for exportation.

(6) Bill of Exchange: A bill or security originally introduced for enabling a merchant in one country to remit money to a correspondent in the other. It is an open letter of request from one man to another desiring him to pay to a third party a specified sum and put it to account of the first. If A in London owe £500 to B in Melbourne (Australia), and C be about to travel from Melbourne to London, then C may pay the £500 to B before departure, and carry a bill of exchange on A in London for the amount. If the last-named gentleman be honest, and if he be solvent, he will repay the money to C on reaching London, and C will have reaped an advantage in having the cash in the form of a bill, which it was safer for him to carry in this form on the passage than if he had had it in notes or gold. In such a transaction, B, the person who writes the bill of exchange, is called the drawer; A, to whom it is written, is termed up to the time that he accepts it, the drawee, and after he has done so the acceptor; and C, his order, or the bearer—in short, whoever is entitled to receive the money—the payee. The bill may be assigned to another by simple endorsement; the person who thus transfers it is named the endorser, and the one to whom it is assigned the endorsee or holder. Every one whose name is on the back of a bill is responsible if the person on whom payment should legitimately fall fail to meet his engagement. The first bills known in England were about A.D. 1328. Bills of exchange are sometimes called drafts. Formerly it was deemed important to divide them into foreign, when they were drawn by a merchant residing abroad or his correspondent in England, and inland when both the drawer and the drawee reside within the kingdom. Now, the distinction is little attended to, there being no legal difference between the two classes of bills.

(7) Bill of Lading: A document by which the master of a ship acknowledges to have received on board his vessel in good order and condition certain specified goods consigned to him by some particular shipper, and binds himself to deliver them in similarly good order and condition—unless the dangers of the sea, fire, or enemies prevent him—to the assignees of the shipper at the port of destination on their paying him the stipulated freight. Usually two or three copies of a bill of lading are made, worded thus: "One of which bills being accomplished, the other stands void." A bill of lading may be transferred by endorsation like a bill of exchange.

(8) Bill of Parcels: An account given by a seller to a buyer, giving a list of the several articles which he has purchased and their prices.

(9) Bill of Sale:

(a) In England: A deed or writing under seal designed to furnish evidence of the sale of personal property. It is necessary to have such an instrument when the sale of property is not to be immediately followed by its transference to the purchaser. It is used in the transfer of property in ships, in that of stock in trade, or the goodwill of a business. It is employed also in the sale of furniture, the removal of which from the house would call attention to the embarrassed circumstances of its owner; hence the statistics of the bills of sale act as an index to measure the amount of secret distress existing in times of commercial depression. In not a few cases bills of sale are used to defeat just claims against the nominal or real vendor of the goods transferred.

(b) In the United States: A writing given by the seller of personal property to the purchaser, answering to a deed of real estate, but without seal.

(10) Bill of Sight: A form of entry at the custom-house by which one can land for inspection, in presence of the officers, such goods as he has not had the opportunity of previously examining, and which, consequently, he cannot accurately describe.

(11) Bill of Store: A license granted at the custom-house to merchants to carry such stores as are necessary for a voyage, without paying customs duty upon them.

V. Statistics. Bill of Mortality: A statistical report of the number of deaths within a certain locality in a year or other specified period of time. To make the figures as useful as possible for scientific purposes, the causes of death are now specified. Bills of mortality for London were first issued during the ravages of a plague in 1592. After an interval they were resumed during another visitation of plague in 1603, and have been published weekly from that time till now.

VI. Nautical. Bill of Health: A certificate given to the master of a ship clearing out of a port in which contagious disease is epidemic, or is suspected to be so, certifying to the state of health of the crew and passengers on board.

bill-book, s. A book in which a merchant keeps an account of the notes, bills of exchange, &c., which he issues or receives in the course of business bill-broker, s. A broker of bills; one who negotiates the discount of bills.

Scots Law: A department of the Court of Session to which suitors may repair at all times, vacations included, in emergencies which require summary procedure. It is here that interdicts are applied for and sequestrations in bankruptcy obtained.

bill-head, s.

Printing: The printed or lithographed forms used by tradesmen and others at the head of their bills or memoranda.

1. A person who holds a bill.

2. An instrument by means of which bills, memorandums, or other slips of paper are secured from being lost, and retained in order. There are various forms of it. The bills or other papers may be put between an upper and a lower plate of metal, which can be kept to the requisite degree of tightness by screws; or there may be a spring clasp, or a wire on which the bills are impaled.

bill-sticker, s. One whose occupation is to stick up bills on walls, hoardings, &c., for advertising purposes.

bill (1), v.t. [From bill, s. (1), in the sense of the beak of a bird. Referring to the practice of doves to manifest affection for each other by placing their bills in conjunction.] To caress, to fondle, to show special affection for.

(1) Of doves:

"Doves, they say, will bill, after their pecking and their murmuring."—Ben Jonson: Cynthia.

(2) Of human beings.

"Still amorous, and fond, and billing, Like Philip and Mary on a shilling."
Swift: Baucis.

† bill (2), v.t. [From BILL (3), s.]

From Fr. bille = a piece of wood, a stick.]

A. As substantive:

* 1. Sing. (of the form billiard): The same as plural BILLIARDS (q.v.).

"With aching heart, and discontented looks, Returns at noon to billiard or to books."
Cowper: Retirement.

2. Plur. (of the forms billiards, balliards): A game of skill, said to have been invented in 1371 by Henrique Devigne, a French artist, though claims have been put forth on behalf of Italy rather than France. It is played on a level and smooth rectangular table with ivory balls, which are driven by a tapering stick called the cue, according to the rules established for the particular game played. (For these games, and the terms used in describing them, see BRICOLE, CARAMBOLE, HAZARDS, POOL, PYRAMIDS, WINNING-GAME, LOSING-GAME, and FOUR GAME.)

"With dice, with cards, with balliards farre unfit."
Spenser: Mother Hub. Tale.

"Let it alone; let's to billiards."—Shakesp.: Ant. & Cleop., ii. 5.

B. As adjective (of the form billiard): Of or pertaining to billiards, or in any way connected with billiards.

billiard ball, s. An ivory ball used in the game of billiards.

"Even nose and cheek withal Smooth as is the billiard ball."
Ben Jonson.

billiard-cloth, s. The fine green cloth covering a billiard-table.

billiard cue, s. A cue or stick, diminishing gradually to a point of half an inch or less in diameter, with which billiard-balls are driven along the table.

billiard-mace, s. A long straight stick with a head at the point formerly used for playing billiards.

1. A person, generally a boy or young man, who marks the points and games at billiards.

2. A counting apparatus for automatically registering these.

† billiard-stick, s. The stick, whether mace or cue, with which billiards are played.

"When the ball obeys the stroke of a billiard-stick, it is not any action of the ball, but mere passion."—Locke.

billiard-table, s. An oblong table on which billiards are played. It is generally about twelve feet long and six feet wide, covered with fine green cloth, surrounded with cushions, and containing six holes or "pockets."

"Some are forced to hound or fly upwards almost like ivory balls meeting on a billiard-table."—Boyle.

¶ Obvious compounds: Billiard-room, billiard-player, &c.

Dryden.

C. As substantive:

1. The act of joining bills as doves do in token of affection.

2. The act of caressing or fondling.

"I never much valued your billings and cockings."—Leigh Hunt.

Bil'-lĭngs-gāte, * Bil'-lĭngs gęte, s. & a. [Said to have been so called from Belinus Magnus, a mythic British prince, father of King Lud, about B.C. 400. More probably from some unknown person called Billing.]

A. As substantive:

1. Topog. & Ord. Lang.: The celebrated London fish-market existent at least as early as A.D. 979, made a free market in 1699, extended in 1849, rebuilt in 1852, and finally exposed to the rivalry of another market begun 1874, complete 1876. (Haydn: Dict. Dates.)

2. Foul abusive language, such as is popularly supposed to be usually employed by those who are unable to come to an amicable understanding as to the proper price of the fish about which they are negotiating. Language of the kind described, however, can come into existence without the presence of a fish-woman to aid in its production, and it is called Billingsgate by whatsoever lips it may be uttered.

(a) In a quarrel about fish.

"Much billingsgate was exchanged between the boats [of the trawlers and those who object to trawling], but there was no actual violence."—Standard.

(b) Fish not being the subject of contention.

"Let Bawdry, Billingsgate, my daughters dear, Support his front, and oaths bring up the rear."
Pope: Dunciad, i. 154.

B. As adjective: Characteristic of Billingsgate.

"... but that Rome, Venice, Paris, and all very large cities have their Billingsgate being sage."—Fuller: Worthies, pt. ii., p. 197.

bil'-l-ŏn, s. [In Dut. biljoen; Ger. & Fr. billion; Port. bilhao. From Lat. prefix bi = two, and (mi)llion. Trillion is on the same model.] A million times a million in English notation. It is written 1 with twelve ciphers after it, or just twice as many as a million has. The notation in France and the United States is different, billion being applied to 1,000 millions, and both of these countries use the word trillion for what the English call a billion.

bill-ît, a. [From A.S. bil, bill = any instrument or weapon made of steel.] Shod with iron. (Rudd.) (Scotch.)

"With the wele stotit and braid billit ax."
Doug.: Virgil, 388, 1 (Jamieson.)

bill-man, *bil-man, s. [Eng. bill (1); and man.] A man furnished with, or armed with, or who is in the habit of using, a "bill."

"Advancing from the wood are seen,
To back and gird . . . the archer band
Lest there's billmen were at hand."
Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, iv. 16.

bil-lôn, s. [Fr. billon = (1) copper coin, (2) debased coin.]

Numis.: A German coin-alloy of copper and silver, the former predominating.

"Are vain as billows in a tossing sea."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. ii.

billow beaten, a. [Eng. (1) billow, and (2) beaten.] Beaten by the billows. (Lit. & fig.)

". . . the billow-beaten fate Of towering statists."
Jordan: Intimacy and Morality in Poetry, 5, b.

bil-low, v.i. [From billow, s. (q.v.).] To swell into surges; to surge; to become hollow and crested. (Johnson.)

†bil-lowed, a. [Eng. billow; -ed.] Swelled like a billow. (Webster.)

bil-low-ing, pr. par. & a. [BILLOW.]

"The billowing snow . . ."—Prior.

bil-low-y, *bil-lów-ie, a. [Eng. billow; -y.]

1. Of the sea: Swelling into billows.

". . . Pontus, the barren and billowy sea."—Grote: Hist. Greece pt. i., ch. i.

2. Of foam: Tossed from the surface of billows.

"Descends the billowy foam. . . ."
Thomson: Seasons: Spring, 879.

3. Of the roar or murmur of the sea: Produced by the billows.

"But thou art swelling on, thou deep!
Though man's proud empires sink to sleep
Thy billowy anthem ne'er shall cease Until the close of time."
Hemans: The Sword of the Sea.

4. Of a grave: Among the billows.

"But just escaped from . . . overpeck a billowy grave, Troubles to him . . . re named again.
Hemans: Songs &c.

"The express' . . . common is a watery grave

Bot.: The double flowered variety of Saxifraga sarmentosa.

* Other plants are also locally designated by the same name.

billy white throat, s. A name for a bird, the Garden Warbler or Pettychaps (Sylvia hortensis).

bil-ly (2), bil lie, s. [Not a dimin. of Bill = William. It may be one who bills, caresses, or fondles another (?).] (Scotch.)

I. In a good sense, as a term of affection or familiarity:

1. A companion, a comrade.

"Twas then the billies crossed the Tweed,
And by Traquair-house scampered."
Hogg: Poems, ii. 7.

2. A brother.

"Become to plain o your man fair Johnie Armstrong, And wae's me for his billy Willie, quo' he."
Hogg: Collect., p. 22.

3. A lover.

"Be not owre howstrous to your billy."
Clerk: Evergreen, ii. 19.

II. In an indifferent or in a slightly bad sense:

1. A boy; a young fellow; a hearty good fellow bent on pleasure.

"And there I met wi' Tam o' Torbshaw, and a wheen o' the rest o' the billies on the water side; they're a'

† bī-mĕm'-brạl, a. [From Lat. bi = two, membrum = members, and Eng. suffix -al.] Having two members. [Used chiefly of sentences.]

 bi-mên', s. [From A.S. bemænen, v.] [BIMENE.] Complaint, cry.

"And [he] to god made hise bimen."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 2,304.

 bi-mene, * by-mene (pret. * bimeut, * bimente), v.t. [A.S. bemænan (pret. bimande) = to bemoan.] [BEMOAN.]

1. To bemoan, to weep for, to wail for.

"xxx dayes wep israel
For his dead . . . and bimeut it wel."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 4149-50.

2. Reflexively: To make one's complaint; to complain.

"Ghe bimente hire to abraham."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 1,217.

 bi-mên'-ing, pr. par. [BIMENE.]

† bī-mĕn'-sạl, a. [Lat. prefix bi = two, and mensis, a month.] Occurring once in two months. [BIMONTHLY.]

† bi-mēst'-ri-ạl, a. [From Lat. bimestri(s), and Eng. suffix -al. In Fr., Sp., Port., and Ital. bimestre.] Continuing for two months.

Currency: Loosely, the concurrent coinage of two metals into standard money; more exactly, the legal obligation of a national mint to coin both gold and silver at a fixed ratio between the two metals, coupled with a law giving such coins identical monetary powers without discrimination as to the metal of which they are composed; in either sense popularly termed a double standard. This system was first introduced in 1803 by the French law of 7 Germinal, year XI., which enacted that 5 grammes weight of silver, nine-tenths fine, should be coined into the monetary unit of one franc. The kilogramme of standard silver was therefore coined into 200 francs. The same law provided for the kilogramme of standard gold, nine tenths fine, being coined into 155 pieces of 20 francs, equal to 3,100 francs, or at the rate of 5 grammes weight of standard gold into 15½ francs, thus establishing the mint ratio of 15½ to 1, which still remains the proportionate weight and comparative mint value, in France, of any given sum in French-coined silver and gold respectively. That bimetallism provides an actual double standard is scientifically untrue, since the natural law of supply and demand renders a continuous parity between any two commodities at a fixed ratio not only unlikely but almost impossible. In actual operation, the plan resolves itself into what may be called alternative monometallism; that is to say, of two metals legally employed on equal terms as a basis of a currency, the cheaper (at the established ratio) will be the actual standard, supplanting and practically nullifying the other and dearer standard until such time as the natural laws of commodity shall reverse the conditions or re-establish between the metals a natural parity in the exchanges—the latter being a rare occurrence. Two separate and different standards for the same coining is a logically absurd proposition, but a legalized choice between two nominal standards is quite reasonable. This bimetallism actually contemplates. [MONEY, ¶; VALUE, s., ¶.]

bi'-month-ly, a. [From Lat. prefix bi, and Eng. monthly.] Happening, leaving, starting, &c., once in two months; as, a bi-monthly mail, a mail which is despatched once in two months. [BIMENSAL.] (Goodrich & Porter.)

• bin, portions of verb. [A.S. beonde, par. of beon, beonas = to be; we beon = we are.] Portions of the verb to be. [BE, BEN.]

1. Been. (Halliwell: Torrent of Portugal.)
2. Are.

"If thou hast formed right true vertues face herein, Vertue her selfe can best discerne to whom they written bin." Spenser. Verses.

3. Were. (Nares.)
4. Is.

bin, s. [A.S. bin, binne = a manger, crib, bin, hutch, or trough. In Dan. bing; Dut. bing = a basket, a hamper; Lat. benna (originally a Gael. word) = a kind of carriage; Wel. ben, wen = a wain, a cart.] A box, or other enclosed place, where corn, bread, wine, or anything similar is kept. Hence such compounds as corn-bin, coal-bin, &c.

"The most convenient way of picking hops is into a long, square frame of wood called a bin."—Mortimer.

bin, interj. [Corrupted from ban, v., in the sense of curse, anathema upon.] A curse, an imprecation. (Jamieson.)

"Bin thae biting clegs."—Jamieson.

bi-nā', vi-nā', s. [In Hindust. bīn; Hindi bīna; Mahratta, vīna.] An Indian guitar, with a long finger-board, and a gourd attached to each end. Seven strings or wires wound round pegs in the usual way are attached to the finger-board—four on the surface, and three at the side. The instrument has about twenty frets. In the performance one gourd is rested on the left shoulder, and the other on the right hip. (Stainer & Barrett.)

• bi'-nal, a. [From Lat. bini(i) = two, and Eng. suffix -al.] [BINARY.] Double, twofold.

"Binal reverence all this."
Ford. Works of Dekker, iii. 3. (Rutherford.)

• bi-nam, pret. of v. [BENIM, BINIMEN.]

• bi'-name, s. [BYNAME.] (Chaucer: Reeve's Tale, 2,333.)

bi'-nar-y, • bi'-nar-ie, a. & s. [In Fr. binaire; Sp., Port., & Ital. binario. From Lat. binarius = consisting of two; bini = two by two, two apiece; from bis = twice with the distributive term nus.]

A. As adj.: Consisting of two, double, dual.

• B. As subst.: That which constitutes two.

Binary arithmetic: A method of notation invented by Leibnitz, but which appears to have been in use in China about 4,000 years ago. As the term binary implies, there are only two characters in this notation, these are 1 and 0. By it, our 1 is noted by 1, our 2 by 10, 3 by 11, 4 by 100, 5 by 101, 6 by 110, 7 by 111, 8 by 1000, 9 by 1001, 10 by 1010, &c. The principle is that 0 multiplies by 2 in place of by 10, as on the common system. Some properties of numbers may be more simply presented on this plan than on the common one; but the number of places of figures required to express a sum of any magnitude is a fatal objection to its use. Indeed, Leibnitz himself did not recommend it for practical application.

Binary compound:

Chem.: A compound of two elements, or of an element and a compound performing the function of an element, or of two compounds performing the functions of elements.

"Among the secondary organic products of the vegetable class we meet a few instances of binary compounds of simple elements."—Pratt & Bowman: Popular Anat., Vol. I. (Introd.), p. 6

Binary engine: Usually an engine having one cylinder, the piston being impelled by steam, which, having done its work there, is exhausted into another part of the apparatus, where it is allowed to communicate its unutilised heat to some liquid volatile at a lower temperature: the vapour of this second liquid, by its expansion in a second cylinder, yields additional useful force. Ether, chloroform, and bisulphide of carbon, have all been tried. (Knight.)

Binary form:

Music: The form of a movement which is founded on two principal themes or subjects. [SONATA FORM.] (Stainer & Barrett.)

Binary logarithms: A system of logarithms devised by Euler for facilitating musical calculations. Instead of having, like the common system of logarithms, 1 as the logarithm of 10, and 43,429,448 as the modulus, it had 1 as the logarithm of 2, and the modulus 1,442,695.

Binary measure: Common time, that is, in which the time of rising is equal to that of falling. [TONIC SOL-FA.]

Binary number: A number composed of two units.

Binary scale:

Arith.: A uniform scale of notation, the ratio of which is two.

Binary star: A star which, closely examined by the telescope, is found to consist of two stars revolving around their common centre of gravity. In some cases they are coloured differently from each other. In 1803 Sir William Herschel discovered that γ Leonis, ε Bootis, ζ Herculis, δ Serpentis, and γ Virginis are revolving double stars, and others, including Castor, have since been added to the list. The period of revolution in various cases has been determined. It is found to vary from 43 to 1,200 years.

Binary system:

Zool., &c.: A system of classification by which each sub-kingdom, class, order, &c., is perpetually divided into two, the one with a positive and the other with a negative character, till genera are reached. For instance, on this system, the animal sub-kingdom is divided into Vertebrata and Invertebrata, that is, animals which have, and animals which have not, vertebræ. The first is a natural combination; the second is not so, for several of its more or less subordinate sections, such as Articulata, Molluscа, &c., are as distinct from each other as the Vertebrata are from the Invertebrata in general.

Binary theory:

Chem.: A hypothesis proposed by Davy to reduce the haloid salts (as NaCl) and the oxygen salts (as $NaNO_3$) to the same type, the monad Cl being replaced by the monad radical containing oxygen (NO_3). Acids are hydrogen salts, as HCl, or $H(NO_3)$. A radical is only part of a molecule which can unite with or replace an element or another radical of similar atomicity for atomicity. Thus the ternary radical $(SO_4)''$ can replace two monad radicals $(NO_3)_2$, as in the equation $Pb(NO_3)_2 + Mg''(SO_4)'' = Pb''(SO_4)'' + Mg''(NO_3)_2$. A radical cannot exist in a separate state. [See RADICAL.]

bi'-nāte, a. [From Lat. bini = two by two, and Eng. suffix -ate.]

Bot.: Growing two together. Having two leaflets growing from the same point at the apex of the common petiole. The same as bifoliolate.

BINATE LEAF.

bind, • bynde, • ban-dan, • byn-den, (pret. bound, • bounde, • bownd, • bond; pa. par bound, bounden, • bownd, • bond), v.t. & i. [A.S. bindan, pret. band, bunde, pa. par. bunden.]

(1) to bind, tie, capture, (2) to pretexl, gebindan (sanic meaning); Sw. & Icel binda; Dan binde; Dut. binden, inbinden, verbinden; Ger binden; Goth. bindan, gabindan; Pers bastan, bandidan = to bind, to shut; Hindi bandhna = to bind; Mahratta bandne; Sanse. bandh.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To tie or fasten artificially.

(1) To tie a person or thing by means of cords, ropes, chains, or anything similar. In the case of persons this may be to prevent one from becoming free, to bandage a bleeding wound: to serve for utility or ornament, or for any other purpose.

"... binding and delivering into prisons both men and women."—Acts xxii. 4.

"Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them."—Matt. xiii. 30

"Thou shalt bind this line ... scarlet thread in the window, whic' thou didst let ... down by."—Josh. ii.

(2) To keep in shape and strengthen by means of an artificial band or border, bands, backs, or anything similar. Used—

(a) Of the border sewed on a carpet, or anything similar.

(b) Of the fastening a wheel by means of a line

(c) Of the stitching, pressing, and cutting a book, and of placing covers upon it. [BOOKBINDING.]

"Was ever book, containing such vile matter, So fairly bound?"
Shakesp.: Rom. & Jul., iii. 2.

"Those who could never read the grammar
When my dear volumes touch the hammer,
May think books best, as ... bound."
Pope.

2. To confine or restrain by physical action. (Used of the operations of nature under the divine control.)

(1) Operating upon persons: To restrain morbid action from movement. Special—

(a) In the case of one bent double by disease.

"And, behold, there was a woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself. ... ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this ... bond on the sabbath day?"—Luke xiii. 11, 16.

(b) Any bin: ering the flux of the bowels, or making them ostive.

"Rhubarb hath manifestly in it parts of a contrary operation: parts that purge, and parts that bind the body."—Bacon.

(3) Operating upon things: To restrain by the operation of the law of gravitation.

"He binds the floods from overflowing."—Job xxviii. 11.

II. Figuratively:

1. To exercise restraint or moral compulsion upon the human mind, heart, conscience, or will, or upon the will of any of the inferior animals.

(a) Upon men: By natural or by human law, by an oath, a contract, a promise, a vow, considerations of duty, kindness shown to one, an overmastering moral impulse, or some other influence or necessity to do some act or abstain from doing it.

"The law, by which all creatures else are bound, Binds man, the lord of all."
Cowper: The Task, bk. i.

"... traitors who were ready to take any oath, and whom no oath could bind."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., vol. iv., ch. xxii.

(b) Upon one of the inferior animals.

"You will sooner by imagination, bind a bird from singing, than from eating or flying."—Bacon.

2. To establish by a judicial decision; to confirm; to ratify.

"... whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven."—Matt. xvi. 19.

B. Intransitive:

1. To contract its own parts together; to grow stiff and hard.

2. To make costive.

3. To be obligatory.

"The promises and bargains for trade, between a form and an Indian, in the woods of America, are binding to them, ..."—Locke.

C. In special phrases: (In those which follow, bind is uniformly transitive.)

(1) Bound in the spirit: Δεδεμενος τῷ πνευματι (dedemenos tō pneumati), lit., bound in the spirit = bound to my own spirit, i.e. ardent spirit leading forward the captive body = under a resistless impulse.

"And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there."—Acts xx. 22.

(2) To bind an apprentice. [Bind out.]

(3) To bind down. To restrain one from perfect freedom on any matter by inducing him to come under formal written stipulations with regard to it.

(4) To bind in: To shut in, so as to make one feel like a prisoner. Used—

(a) Of a physical restraint around one.

"In such a dismal place,
Where joy never enters, which the sun ne'er cheers, Bound in with darkness, overspread with damps."
Dryden.

(b) Of a moral restraint.

"Now I'm cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd, bound in To saucy doubts and fears."
Shakesp.: Macbeth, iii. 4.

(5) To bind out, or simply to bind, an apprentice, to draw out indentures, guaranteeing his services to a particular master, on certain conditions, for a specified time.

(6) Law. To bind over: To oblige to make appearance in a court of law under penalties for failing to do so.

"Sir Roger was staggered with the reports concerning this woman, and would have bound her over to the county sessions."—Addison.

(7) To bind to:

(i.) To place under indentures or contract, or any other obligation to a person.

"Art thou bound to a wife, seek not to be loosed."—1 Cor. vii. 27.

(ii.) To impel to a course of action.

(a) By considerations of duty.

"To ... I am bound to every act of duty,
I am not bound to that all slaves are free to."
Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 3.

(b) By the lower propensities of one's nature.

"If still thou dost retain
The same ill habits, the same follies too, Still thou art bound to vice, and still a slave."
Dryden.

(8) To bind up:

(i.) Lit.: To tie up with bandages or anything similar. Used—

(a) Of a wound tied up with bandages.

"... and when he saw him, he had compassion on him. And went to him, and bound up his wounds."—Luke x. 33, 34.

(b) Of anything else.

"Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples."—Isaiah viii. 16.

(ii.) Fig.: To confine, to restrain.

"... is not the only cause that binds up the understanding, and confines it for the time to one object, from which it will not be taken off."—Locke.

¶ (a) Crabb thus distinguishes the verbs to bind and to tie:—"Binding is performed by circumvolution round a body; tying, by involution within itself. Some bodies are bound without being tied; others are tied without being bound; a wounded leg is bound but not tied; a string is tied but not bound, a ribbon may sometimes be bound round the head, and tied under the chin. Binding therefore serves to keep several things in a compact form together; tying may serve to prevent one single body separating from another; a criminal is bound hand and foot; he is tied to a stake." "Binding and tying likewise differ in degree; binding seems to produce adhesion in all the parts of a body; tying only to produce contact in a single part." Similarly, in the figurative use of the terms, a "bond of union is applicable to a large body with many component parts; a tie of affection marks an adhesion between individual minds."

(b) To bind, to oblige, and to engage are thus discriminated:—"Bind is more forcible and coercive than oblige; oblige than engage. We are bound by an oath, obliged by circumstances, and engaged by promises. Conscience binds, prudence or necessity oblige, honour and principle engage. A parent ought no less by the law of his conscience than by those of the community to which he belongs, to provide for his helpless offspring. Politeness obliges men of the world to preserve a friendly exterior towards those whom they have no regard. When we are engaged in the service of our king and country, we cannot shrink from our duty without exposing ourselves to the infamy of all the world." "A debtor is bound to pay by virtue of a written instrument in law; he is obliged to pay in consequence of the importunate demands of the creditor; he is engaged to pay in consequence of a promise given. A bond is the strictest deed in law; an obligation binds under pain of a pecuniary loss; an engagement is mostly verbal, and rests entirely on the rectitude of the parties." (Crabb: English Synon.) bind, bynde (English), bind, bind (Scotch), s. [From bind, v. (q.v.).]

A. Ordinary Language:

"1. A tendril; a flexible shoot; a twining or climbing stem.

"Bynde, a twyste of a wyne (vyne, P.): Capriolus, C. V.—Prompt. Parv.

"2. A name formerly given to the common Honeysuckle or Woodbine (Lonicera periclymenum, Lin.)

"Bynde, or wode bynde: Corrigiola, vitella, Cath. (edera volubilis, K.).—Prompt. Parv.

¶ Common bind: Probably both Convolvulus arvensis and C. sepium. [BINDWEED.]

"3. Dimension; size. (Scotch.)

(1) Literally:

(a) Size, specially with reference to the circumference of anything. Thus a barrel of certain bind is one of certain dimensions.

"It is statute—that the barrell of Rochell and Bellmont sould keip and contein the measure and quantitie of four tene gallons, ..."—Acts Ja. III. 140.. (c. 121 [of] 1566), c. 121.

(b) Size or dimension in general.

"The wylde geese of the ... bind ..."—Acts Mar. 1551, c. 11 (ed. 1566).

(2) Fig.: Power, ability.

¶ Above my bind: Beyond my power. (Jamieson.)

B. Technically:

1. Hop-growing: A stalk of hops, so called from its winding round a pole or tree, or being tied to it.

"The two best sorts are the white and the grey bind, the latter is a large square hop, and the more hardy."—Mortimer: Art of Husb.

II. Music:

1. A curved line, ⁀, a sign which, when placed over two notes of the same name or same pitch, enharmonically changed, directs that the two are to be sustained as one. It is of frequent occurrence at points of syncopation and suspension. It is not the same as a slur (q.v.).

2. A brace (Fr. accolade) which binds together the separate parts of a score. (Stainer & Barrett.)

III. Metal-working: Induratod clay when mixed with oxide of iron.

IV. Fishing. A bind of eels: A quantity consisting of ten strikes, each containing twenty-five eels, or 250 in all.

 bind-pock, * bind-poke, s. One who binds up his poke or sack, or pocket, instead of opening it for charitable purposes; a niggard. (Scotch.)

"The fools call a niggardly man a bind-poke."—Kelly, p. 249 (Jamieson).

bind-rail,

Hydraulic Engineering: A piece to which the heads of piles are secured by mortising or otherwise, serving to tie several of them together and as a foundation for the flooring-joists or stringers. A cap.

bind-corn, s. [Eng. bind; corn. So called from its twining around the stems of corn.] A plant, Polygonum convolvulus. (Scotch.) bind-er,  bin-dère, s. [From Eng. bind, v., and suff. -er. In Dan., Dut., & Ger. binder; Sw., in compos., bindare, bindar.]

A. Ordinary Language:

1. One who binds.

(a) Sheaves, or anything like them literally tied up.

"Three binders shout and took the handfuls reaped,
From boys that gather'd quickly up."—Chapman.

(b) Books. (In this sense generally in composition, as bookbinder.)

2. That which binds.

(1) A fillet, a band.

"A doe ... clothe of such length as might serve to encompass the fractured limb, cut in two equal parts, and each end to the middle, take three ...."—Wiseman.

(2) An astringent.

"Ale is their eating and drinking, which keeps their bodies clear ... being a strong binder, and, for that, abolish. ... Bread is a binder."—Beaumont & Fletcher: Scornful Lady.

B. Technically:

1. Carp.: A tie-beam, a binding-joist supporting transversely the bridging-joists above and the ceiling-joists below, to shorten the bearings. (Knight.)

2. Shipbuilding: A principal part of a ship's frame, such as keel, transom, beam, knee, &c. (Knight.)

3. Timber trade (pl. binders): The long pliant shoots of hazel, ash, willows, and similar trees which have elasticity and strength enough to make them useful in fastening down newly-plucked sedges, in making close fences round rabbit-warrens, sheep-folds, &c.; in forming hurdles, and in tying up faggots and brooms. In various parts of the country they are called also WITHERS, WEEPS, EDDERS, or RODERS. (Timber Trade Journal.)

4. Agriculture:

(1) An attachment to a reaping-machine which binds the gavels into sheaves.

(2) A wisp of straw, a cord, wire, or other band for binding a sheaf of grain.

5. Weaving: A lever applied in a shuttle-box to arrest the shuttle and prevent its rebounding.

6. Sewing-machine: A device for folding a binding about the edge of a fabric and sewing it thereto.

7. Bookbinding: A cover for music, magazines, or papers, forming a temporary binder to keep them in order for convenient reference.

binder-frame, s. A hanger with adjustable bearings by which the angular position of the shafting may be regulated to suit the plane of motion of the belting.

Bookbinding: A thick sheet of hard, smooth, calendered pasteboard, between which printed sheets are pressed to give them a smooth surface. Also the stiff pasteboards which form the basis of the sides of book covers.

† bind-ér-ý, s. [Eng. bind; -ery. In Ger. buchbinderei; Dut. binderij.] A place where binding is carried on. Specially a place where books are bound. (Pen. Cycl.) Said to be recent in its origin, and to have come at first from America, where it is very common.

bind-héi-mite, s. [Named after Bindheim, who analysed and described it. Eng., &c., suff. -ite. (Min.) (q.v.).] A mineral, called also bleinierite, the British Museum Catalogue having the latter name, whilst Dana prefers the former one. It occurs amorphous, reniform, spheroidal, encircling, or in other forms or ways. The hardness is 4; the sp. gr. 4·60—5·05; the lustre resinous, dull, or earthy; the colour white, gray, brownish, or yellowish. Composition: Antimonic acid, 32·71—47·36; oxide of lead, 40·73—61·38; water, 5·48—11·98, with other ingredients. It is produced by the decomposition of various antimonial ores. It occurs in Cornwall and Siberia.

bind'-ĭng, * byn-dinge, * byn-dynge, pr. par., a., & s. [Bind, v.]

A. As present participle: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As participial adjective. Specially—

1. Astringent.

2. Stiff and hard.

"If the land is a binding land, you must make it fine by harrowing of it."—Mortimer.

3. Hindering; restraining.

"Even adverse navies bless'd the binding gale."
Thomson: Liberty, pt. iv.

C. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of binding, tying, fastening, or otherwise restraining; the state of being so tied, fastened, or otherwise restrained.

2. That which binds, ties, fastens, or otherwise restrains.

II. Technically:

1. Book-binding. Spec.: The art of putting covers on a book. [Book-binding.]

2. Fencing: A method of securing or crossing an opponent's sword by means of pressure accompanied with a spring of the wrist.

3. Naut., Shipbuilding, &c. (pl. bindings):

(a) The timbers of a ship which hold the frames together. Such are the beams, knees, clamps, water-ways, &c.

(b) The iron wrought around the dead-eyes.

binding-cloth, s.

Cloth manuf.: Dyed and stamped muslin for covering books. The dyed cloth is passed between engraved rollers, or is worked after being cut into patterns of the required size. The engraved cylinders of hard steel confer the impress characteristic of the back and sides along with embossed designs over the surface in sharp relief. It is a cheap and good substitute for leather, which it has nearly superseded for general use. (Knight.) binding-guide, s.

In Sewing-machines: A device adapted to receive a binding and fold it about the edge of a piece of material to be bound. Two methods have been tried. 1. A flattened tube folded gradually on itself longitudinally from near its receiving to its delivering end, but with a space left for the edge of the material. 2. Adjustable hooks projecting through the face of a guide and facing each other; the binding is directed by the guide and hooks, the material to be bound rests between the hooks, and the latter are adjustable, to lap the binding more or less on either side. Some binders turn in or hem the edges of a bias strip of cloth as it is applied for a binding. (Knight.) binding-joist, s.

Carp.: A binder, a joist whose ends rest upon the wall-plates, and which support the bridging or floor joists above and the ceiling joists below. The binding-joist is employed to carry common joists when the area of the floor or ceiling is so large that it is thrown into bays. With large floors the binding-joists are supported by girders. [Girder.] Binding-joists should have the following dimensions:—

Length of Bearing. Feet.	Depth. Inches.	Width. Inches.
8	7	4½
10	8	5
12	9	5½
14	10	6
16	11	6½
18	12	7

(Knight.)

binding-plate, s. One of the side plates of a puddling or boiling furnace, which are tied together by bolts across the furnace, and by flanges, and serve to bind the parts of the furnace together and prevent the spreading of the arched roofs of the furnaces and iron chamber. [Puddling-furnace.] (Knight.) binding-rafter, s.

Carp.: A longitudinal timber in a roof, supporting the rafters at a point between the comb and eave. (Knight.) binding-screw, s. A set-screw which binds or clamps two parts together. The term is applied especially, in instruments of graduation and measurement, to a screw which clamps a part in a given position of adjustment. For instance, the screw by which the wire of a galvanic battery is held in close contact with other metallic portions in the circuit is regarded as a binding-screw. (Knight.) binding-screw clamp, s.

Galvanism: A device used with voltaic batteries; the lower portion is a clamp for the zinc or copper element, which is suspended in the bath; the upper has a hole for the conductor-wire, and a screw which comes forcibly down upon it to ensure contact. (Knight.) binding-strakes, s. pl.

Shipbuilding: Thick strakes, planking, or wales, at points where they may be bolted to knees, shelf-pieces, &c. (Knight.) binding-wire, s. The wrapping-wire for attaching pieces which are to be soldered together, or to hold in intimate contact the parts concerned in a voltaic circuit. (Knight.) bind'-ĭng-lĭ, adv. [Eng. binding; -ly.] In a binding manner; so as to bind. (Webster.) bind'-ĭng-nĕss, s. [Eng. binding; -ness.] The quality of being binding; that is, of having force to bind. (Coleridge.) bind'-ĭngs, s. pl. [Binding.]

Ship-building. [Binding, C. II. 3.]

bin'-dle, s. [A.S. bindele = a binding, tying, or fastening with bands. In Sw. bindel = bandage, a fillet; Dan. & Dut. bindzel. From Sw. binda; Dan. binde; Dut. & Ger. binden = to bind.] The cord or rope that binds anything, whether made of hemp or straw. (Scotch.) (Jamieson.) bind'-wēed, s. [Eng. bind; weed = the weed that binds, so called from its long, slender, twining stem.]

1. The English name of the plants belonging to the extensive genus Convolvulus.

¶ Bindweeds (pl.) is the English designation given by Lindley to the order Convolvulaceæ.

2. Smilax aspera, a climbing shrub, a native of the south of France, of Italy, &c.

¶ Bindweed is the local name of several other species of plants. In Ayrshire it is applied to the Common Ragwort (Senecio Jacobæa), but in this case it is really a corruption of Bunweed (q.v.).

Black Bindweed: Polygonum convolvulus, L.

Blue Bindweed: Solanum dulcamara, L. (Ben Jonson: Vision of Delight.)

Hooded Bindweeds: Plants of the family Convolvulaceæ and the genus Calystegia. It is only a book name.

Ivy Bindweed: Polygonum convolvulus, L.

Nightshade Bindweed: Circæa lutetiana, L.

Sea Bindweed: Convolvulus soldanella, L.

Small Bindweed: Convolvulus arvensis, L.

bind'-with, s. [Eng. bind, and with, s. So called because it is used in place of "withs," or withies, for binding up other plants. (Prior.)] The Clematis vitalba, or Travellers' Joy.

bind-wŏod (d of bind mute), s. [Eng. bind; -wood = the wood that binds.] A Scotch name for Ivy (Hedera helix.) (Jamieson.)

† bine, * byne, s. [From bind.] The running or climbing stem of a plant. (Used especially of the hop plant.) [Bind, s., B. I.] (Gardner.)

* bin-ē-ōthe, * bi-nē-then, prep. & adv. The same as Beneath (q.v.).

bi-nēr'-vāte, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and Eng. nervate = pertaining to a nerve.] [Nerve.]

Bot.: Two-nerved. Applied to leaves which have two raised "nerves" or "veins" along their leaf.

* bi-nethe, * bi-ne-then, prep. & adv. [Beneath.]

bine'-wēed, s. [Bine = bind, and weed.] A name sometimes given to a plant, Convolvulus sepium, more commonly called Bindweed (q.v.). (Britten & Holland.) bing (1), (Scotch & O. Eng.), s. [Sw. hinge = a heap; Icel. hingr. Binge in Dan. means not a heap, but a bin.]

1. Gen.: A heap.

"Quhen thay depulye the mekill bing of qu'ete."
Doug. Virgil, 113, 6.

"Potato-bings are snugged up frae skaith
O' coming winter's biting, frosty breath.
Burns. The Brigs of Ayr.

2. Spec.: A pile of wood, immediately designed as a funeral pile.

"The grete bing was vpbeildit wele,
Of alk trees, sand fyrren schydis dry, Wythin the secryt cloys, vnder the sky."
Doug. Virgil, iii, 4.

bing (2), bynge, s. [Dan. bing = a bin, a bin; A.S. bin = a bin, a trough.] A trough.

The same as Bin, Binne (q.v.).

Mining: A place for receiving ore ready for smelting.

bing-hole, s. The opening through which ore ready for smelting is thrown.

bing-ore, s. The largest and best of the ore.

bing-stead, s. The place where the best of the ore (bing-ore) is thrown when ready for the merchant.

bing, v.t. [From bing, s. (q.v.).] To put into a heap. Used—

(a) Gen.: Of anything.

"The hairst was ower, the barnyard fill'd,
The tatoes bing'd, the mart was kill'd." &c.
Blackwood's Mag., Dec. 1833.

(b) Spec.: Of the accumulation of money.

"singin upo the verdnat plain, Ye'll bing up siller o yir ain."
Tarras: Poems, p. 66. (Jamieson.)

* bi-nime, * be-nome, * bi-ni-men, * bi-no-men (pret. binam, pa. par. benumen), v.t. [A.S. beniman, pret. benam, pa. par. benumen = (1) to deprive, to take away, (2) to stupefy, to benumb; be, and niman = to take away.]

1. To take away.

"Fro me thine distres bi nimen."
Story of Gen. & Exod., l. 7

2. To rescue.

"Ic were al that thu was binumen."
Story of Gen. & Exod., l. 87.

3. To place.

"His heued under fote bi-numen."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 85.

4. To use.

"Sichem, sithen, hire ille binam."
Story of Gen. & Exod., l. 76.

bĭnk, v.t. [Etym. doubtful.] To press down, so as to deprive anything of its proper shape. (Used principally of shoes when, by careless wearing, they are allowed to fall down in the heels.) (Jamieson.) bĭnk (1), s. [In Dut. bank = a bench, a pew, a bank, or a shelf.] [Bank, Bench, Bide. (Scotch.)]

1. A bench.

(a) In a general sense: Any bench or seat.

(b) Spec.: The long seat before the fire in a country-house.

2. A bank; an acclivity.

¶ Bink of a peat-moss: The perpendicular part of a peat-moss from which the labourer who stands opposite to it cuts his peats. (Statist. Acc. of Scotland.)

3. A plate-rack, consisting of shelves which plates are kept.

". . . while she contemplated a very handsome and good-humoured face in a broken mirror raised by the bink (the shelves on which the plates are disposed for her special accommodation."—Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xii.

bink-side, s. The side of the long seat before the fire. (Tarras, Poems.)

bĭnk (2), s. [From English bin, or Scotch bunker (?) (q.v.).]

Cotton Manuf.: A sack of cotton in a bin or on the floor, consisting of successive layers of cotton from different bales laid in alternate strata, in order to blend them. The supply of cotton for the machinery is taken by raking down the take so as to mix the cotton of the successive layers at each take.

* binn (1), s. [Bin.]

binn (2), s. [Etym. doubtful. Jamieson suggests Wel. bydin = a troop, a company.] The whole of the reapers employed on the harvest-field. (Jamieson.) bin'-na, pres. indic. & 2nd per. imper. of v. [Be, and na = not.] Be not. (Scotch and Provincial Eng.)

"I ken nacbody but my brother, Monkbarns himself, and me through the like o't, if, indeed, it binna you, Mr. Lovel."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xi.

bin-na-cle, † bin-ă-cle, * bit-ta-cle, s. [In Sp. bitacora = a binnacle; Port. bitacola = a binnacle; Fr. habitacle = a habitation, a binnacle; Lat. habiticulum = a dwelling-place, a habitation; habito = to dwell, to inhabit, frequent of habeo = to have.]

Nautical:

1. (Of the older and more correct form bittacle): Same meaning as 2 (q.v.).

"Bittacle, a timber frame, where the compass stands before the steersman."—Glossog. Nov. 2nd ed. (1719.)

¶ The same form is in Martin's Old English Dict. (1754) and Johnson's Dict. (1773). In these and others of similar dates, bittacle alone occurs. Sheridan's Dict., 4th ed. (1797), has both binacle and bittacle, and under the latter these words occur: "now usually called binacle." Thus apparently the transition from bittacle to binnacle was made between the years 1773 and 1797. Todd (2nd ed., 1827) omits binnacle and goes back to bittacle. Webster (ed. 1848) has both binnacle and bittacle, giving the full explanation of the word under the former spelling.

2. (Of the modern and corrupt spelling binnacle, probably from its being erroneously supposed to mean a little binn or bin): A wooden case or box in which the compass on board a ship is kept to protect it from injury.

BINNACLE.

A light is placed within it at night to ensure that its indications are seen. It is placed immediately in front of the wheel or steering-apparatus, and secured to the deck, usually by metal stays. The after portion has glass windows, so that the compass is at all times visible to the helmsman, who stands at the wheel.

bine, s. [A.S. binne = a bin, a trough.] A temporary enclosure for preserving grain. [BIN.] (Scotch.) bin-nen, prep. & adv. [A.S. binnan = within.] Within.

"And it wurth with binnen awile sel."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 1,082.

† bin-nër, v.i. [Perhaps from Wel. buanaccor = swift. buanred = rapid.]

Of wheels: To move round rapidly with a whirring sound. (Jamieson.) bin'-nite, s. [From the valley of Binn or Binnenthal in Switzerland, where it occurs; suff. -ite (min.) (q.v.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A brittle mineral with isometric crystals; hardness, 4·5; sp. gr., 4·477; lustre, metallic; colour, brownish, greenish, or on a fresh fracture black; streak, cherry red. Composition: Sulphur, 27·55 to 32·73; arsenic, 18·98—30·06; copper, 35·74—46·24; lead, 0—2·75; silver, 1·3—1·91; iron, 0—0·62. It occurs in dolomite at Binn (see etym.). It is called also Dufrenoysite. (Dana.)

2. (In Ger. *binnit.) The same as Sartorite (q.v.).

† bin'-ŏ-cle, s. [From Fr. binocle; Ital. binoculo; Lat. bini = two by two, and oculus = eye.] A binocular telescope (q.v.).

bi-nŏc'-ū-lar, a. [In Fr. binoculaire; from bini = two by two, and oculus = an eye.]

1. Having two eyes.

"Most animals are binocular, spiders for the most part octonocular, and some monocular."—Derham.

2. Pertaining to both eyes; as, "binocular vision."

3. Having two tubes, each furnished above with an eye-glass, so as to enable one to see with both eyes at once. Many opera-glasses, telescopes, and microscopes are now binocular. (See compound words.)

binocular eye-piece, s.

Optics: An eye-piece so constructed and applied to the object-glass as to divide the optical pencil transmitted to the latter, and form, as to each part of the divided pencil, a real or virtual image of the object beyond the place of division.

binocular-glass, s.

Optics: An eye-glass or telescope to which both eyes may be applied.

binocular microscope, s.

Optics: A microscope with two eye-glasses, so that both eyes may use it simultaneously.

binocular telescope, s.

Optics: A pair of telescopes mounted in a stand, and having a parallel adjustment for the width between the eyes. The tubes have a coincident horizontal and vertical adjustment for altitude and azimuth.

bi-nŏc'-ū-late, a. [From Lat. bini = two by two, oculus = an eye, and suff. -ate.] Having two eyes. [BINOCULAR.]

bi-nŏc'-ū-lus, s. [From Lat. bini = two by two, and oculus = an eye.]

Zool.: The name given by Geoffrey, Leach, &c., to a genus of Entomostracous Crustaceans, now more generally called Apus (q.v.).

bi-nō'-dal, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and Eng. nodal = pertaining to a node; from Latin nodus = a knot.]

Bot.: Having two nodes. It is used specially of the inflorescence called the cyme, as existing in some monocotyledonous plants.

bi-nō'-mi-al, a. & s. [Lat. prefix bi = two; nomi(en) = a name; i connective; and Eng. suff. -al. In Fr. binome; Port. binomo.]

A. As adjective:

1. Phys. Science: Having two distinct names. [BINOMIAL SYSTEM.]

2. Algebra: Pertaining to a quantity consisting of two terms united together by the signs + or −. If x joins them, they are only a monomial. A binomial is ranked under the general term polynomial. [BINOMIAL THEOREM.]

B. As substantive: A quantity consisting of two terms united by the signs + or −.

binomial system.

Nomenclature of Animals, Plants, &c.: A system (that which now obtains), which gives to an animal, a plant, or other natural object, two names, the first to indicate the genus and the second the species to which it belongs, as Canis familiaris (the dog), Bellis perennis (the daisy).

"This system [of zoological nomenclature] is called the binomial system from the circumstance that, according to this method, every animal receives two names, one belonging to itself exclusively, the other in common with all the other species of the genus in which it is included."—Dallas: Nat. Hist. Anim. King., p. 11.

binomial theorem.

Algebra: A theorem, or it may be called a law, discovered by Sir Isaac Newton, by which a binomial quantity can be raised to any power without the trouble of a series of actual multiplications. Actual multiplication shows that the 7th power of $x + a$ is $x^7 + 7x^6a + 21x^5a^2 + 35x^4a^3 + 35x^3a^4 + 21x^2a^5 + 7xa^6 + a^7$. It is evident that the several powers of the two letters x and a and the co-efficients stand so related to each other that study of them might enable one to educe a law from them. In its most abstract form it is this:—If $(x + a)$ be raised to the nth power, that is, $(x + a)^n$, it $= x^n + nx^{n-1}a + \frac{n.(n-1)}{1.2}x^{n-2}a^2 + \frac{n.(n-1)(n-2)}{1.2.3}x^{n-3}a^3 + \ldots$ &c.

† bi-nŏm'-in-ous, a. [From Lat. binomin, the root of binomen, genit. binominis = having two names; from prefix bi = two, and nomen, gen. nominis = name; suff. -ous.] Having two names.

bi-nŏt' (t silent), s. [Fr.]

Agric.: A kind of double-mould board-plough.

bi-nŏt'-in-ous, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two; Eng. not(e), and suff. -inous.] Consisting of two notes, as the song of some birds. (Montagu.) bī'-noūs, a. [From Lat. bini = two by two; suff. -ous.] Double.

bi-nŏx'-ide, s. [From Lat. bini = two by two, and Eng. oxide (q.v.).]

Chem.: A combination of two atoms of oxygen with an element. [B. I., Chem.] bi-ŏc'-ĕl-lāte, a. [From Lat. pref. bi = two, and Eng. ocellate (q.v.).]

Entom.: Having two ocelli on its wings.

bi-ō-chĕm'-ic, bi-ō-chĕm'-ic-ăl, a. Of or pertaining to biochemistry.

bi-ō chĕm'-is-trў, s. [From Gr. βίος (bios) = life, and Eng. chemistry (q.v.).] That branch of chemistry which treats of the composition of animal and vegetable tissues and fluids.

¶ The new Biochemic System of medicine was founded by Dr. Schussler, of Oldenburg, Germany, about 1875 and has gained many adherents in this country. Its method is to directly supply certain cell-salts the deficiency of which is indicated by the presence of disease.

bi-ō dў'-nam'-ics, s. [From Gr. βίος (bios) = life, and Eng. dynamics (q.v.).] The dynamics of life, the doctrine of vital forces or activity. (Dunglison.) bī'-ō-gen, s. [Gr. βίος (bios) = life, and γεν- (gen-) root of γεννάω (gennaō) = to beget.] (See extract.)

"The substance of the soul, to which I apply the name biogen."—E. Comte: Biogen, p. 83.

bī-ō-gĕn'-ĕ-sis, s. [Gr. βίος (bios) = life, γένεσις (genesis) = generation.]

Biol.: A scientific word invented by Prof. Huxley, and first used by him in his address as President of the British Association at Liverpool, 1870, to indicate the view that living matter can be produced only from that which is itself living. [ABIOGENESIS and PARTHENOGENESIS.] Prof. Huxley, after summing up the arguments for and against Redi's great doctrine of biogenesis, adds the words, "Which appears to me, with the limitations I have expressed, to be victorious along the whole line at the present day." (Huxley: British Association Report, 1870, pp. lxxvi.)

bi-ō gĕn'-ĕ-sist, s. [Eng. biogenes(is); -ist.] One who accepts the doctrine of biogenesis.

bī ō ĝĕ-nĕt'-ic, a. [Gr. βίος (bios) = life, and Eng. genetic.] Pertaining to biogeny.

bi-ŏĝ'-ĕn-ist, s. [Eng. biogen(y); -ist.] One skilled in biogeny.

bi-ŏĝ'-ĕn-y, s. [Gr. βίος (bios) = life, and γενάω (gennaō) = to beget, to engender.]

1. The history of organic evolution. (Häckl: Evolution of Man (Eng. ed.), i. 6.)

2. Biogenesis (q.v.).

"If the doctrine of biogeny is true, the air must be thick with germs."—Huxley: Presidential Address Brit. Assoc., 1870, p. lxxii.

bī'-ō-graph, s. [BIOGRAPHY.] A biography; a biographical article or notice.

bī'-ō-graph, v.t. [BIOGRAPH, s.] To write a biographical notice of.

bī-ŏg'-rą-phēr, s. [BIOGRAPHY.] The subject of a biography.

bi-ŏg'-rąph-ĕr, s. [From Eng. biograph(y); -er. In Sw. biograf; Dan. & Ger. biograph; Fr. biographe; Port. biographo; Ital. biografo; all from Gr. βίος (bios) = the time or course of life, life, and γράφω (graphō) = to write.] [Biography.] One who writes the lives or memoirs of persons deceased.

¶ It is used—

(1) As a simple word:

"... that industrious and exact antiquary and biographer, Mr. Anthony à Wood, ..."—Wood Athenæ Oxon.: Bookseller to the Reader.

(2) In compos.: In the term autobiographer = one who is a biographer of himself, i.e., who writes his own life or memoirs. [Auto-biographer.]

* bi-ŏ-grăph'-i-ą, s. [Biography.]

† bi-ŏ-grăph'-ic, bi-ŏ-grăph'-i-cal, a. [In Fr. biographique; Port. biographico; from Gr. βίος (bios) = course of life, and γραφικός (graphikos) = capable of drawing, painting, or writing.] Pertaining to biography. [Biography.]

"The short biographical notices which were inscribed under the ancestorial images were doubtless in many cases derived from an early date."—Lewis: Rom. Hist., ch. vi., § 2, vol. i., p. 18.

bi-ŏ-grăph'-i-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. biographical; -ly.] After the manner of biography or of a biographer. (Ec. Rev.) bi-ŏg'-rą-phize, v.t. [Biograph(y), term. -ize.] To write the life of a person.

"As a Latin poet, I biographize him."—Southey: Letters, i. 115 bi-ŏg'-rą-phy, * bi-ŏ-grăph'-i-ą, s. [In Ger. & Fr. biographie; Port. biographia; Ital. & Sp. biografia. From Gr. βίος (bios) = course of life such as man leads, as opposed to ζωή (zōē), that led by the inferior animals. Βιος (Bios) is used also to mean biography. Graphy is from Gr. γραφή (graphē) = a delineation, a writing, a description; γράφω (graphō) = to grave, to write.] The written life of an eminent person. It is supposed to be fuller than memoirs, which simply record the more memorable scenes in his history. The word biography is quite recent. As Trench shows, it came into the language first as biographia. This latter term, though it looks Greek, or Latin borrowed from Greek, is really in neither tongue, though it occurs in Portuguese, and analogous words exist in French, Italian, and Spanish. [See etym.] Though the term biography is modern, the kind of literature which it describes is ancient. In the book of Genesis there are biographies, or at least memoirs, of Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and others. Homer's "Odyssey" may be considered to be an extended biography of Ulysses, limited, however, to the most interesting period of his life – that of his wanderings. Though the "Iliad" may be loosely called a history of the Trojan war, yet, more accurately, it is a chapter from the biography of Achilles, describing calamities brought upon the Greeks by the revenge which he took on Agamemnon for carrying off his female captive Briseis. The most elaborate ancient Greek biography was Plutarch's Parallel Lives, Βίοι Παράλληλοι (Bioi Parallēloi), consisting of forty-six memoirs of Greek, Roman, and other celebrities; it was published about A.D. 80. In B.C. 44, Cornelius Nepos had sent forth a biographical work, his Vitæ Imperatorum, Lives of Commanders.

In more modern times very extended biographies have been attempted. Thus France has its Biographie Universelle in fifty-two volumes, published between 1810 and 1828, and England, among other works, possesses its Biographia Britannica (five volumes) (1747–1766), its English General Biographical Dictionary, eleven volumes (1762), and Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary, thirty-two volumes (1812–1817), and the great Dictionary of National Biography (commenced in 1885, and planned to make fifty volumes).

Among works of more limited aim may be noted various Lives of the Saints, Foxe's Book of Martyrs, various Lives of the Poets, Boswell's Life of Johnson, and finally Men of the Time, in which last work are memoirs of living instead of dead heroes.

One branch of biography is autobiography, in which a person gives his own life or memoirs. Cæsar's Commentaries is a most valuable example of this kind of writing.

Biography is properly a department of history which, as Macaulay shows, should be a history not solely of kings or similar personages, but of the people also over whom they rule. The more prominent a person has been, the more nearly does his biography become identical with history in the ordinary sense. A life or memoir of Martin Luther, Napoleon I., or the first Duke of Wellington, is in all essential particulars history, and that not of a solitary nation, but of Europe, nay, even of the world.

¶ Biography is used—

(1) As a simple word.

"Biographia, or the history of particular men's lives, comes next to be considered."—Dryden.

"... no species of writing seems more worthy of cultivation than biography, since none can more certainly enchain the heart by irresistible interest, or more widely diffuse instruction to every diversity of condition."—Johnson: Rambler, No 60.

(2) As a compound, in the term autobiography (q.v.).

bi-ŏ-lŏg'-i-cal, a. [In Fr. biologique; from Gr. βιος (bios) = course of life, and λογικος (logikos) = pertaining to speech or reason; λογός (logos) = a word, ... a discourse; suff. -al.]

Phys. Science: Pertaining or relating to the science of biology.

"The state of biological science."—Dr. Allen Thomson Brit. Assoc. Rep. (1871), pt. ii. 114.

bi-ŏ-lŏg'-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. biological; -ly.] In a biological manner.

bi-ŏl'-ŏ-gist, s. [Gr. βίος (bios) = course of life, and λογιστής (logistēs) = a calculator, a reasoner; λογίζομαι (logizomai) = to count, reckon.]

Phys. Science: One who cultivates the science of biology.

"... the problems and argumentations familiar to the professed biologist, ..."—Prof. Rolleston. Brit. Assoc. Rep. (1870), pt. ii., 98.

bi-ŏl'-ŏ-gy, s. [In Fr. biologie; from Gr. βίος (bios) = course of life (Biography), and λογος (logos) = ... discourse.]

Phys. Science: A term, first introduced by Treviranus of Bremen, recently adopted by the leading British naturalists, and now obtaining universal currency. It is used in two senses—

(1) (In a more restricted sense): Physiology.

"... the word Biology is at present used in two senses, the one wider, the other more restricted. In this latter sense the word becomes equivalent to the older and still more currently used word 'Physiology.'"—Prof. Rolleston: Brit. Assoc. Rep. (1870), pt. ii., 96.

(2) (In a wider sense): The science of life in its widest acceptation. It specially addresses itself to scientific inquiries into the first origin of life and the changes it has undergone from the earliest traceable period until now. There has been since the year 1865 or 1866 a section of the British Association termed Biology, and a similar section in the American Association. It is divided into three departments (formerly called sub-sections), the first named Zoology and Botany, the second Anthropology, and the third Anatomy and Physiology.

"It is in the wider sense that the word is used when speaking of this as being the section of Biology; and this wider sense is a very wide one, for it comprehends first animal and vegetable physiology and anatomy; secondly, ethnology and anthropology; and, thirdly, scientific zoology and classificatory botany, inclusively of the distribution of species."—Prof. Rolleston. Brit Assoc. Rep. (1870), pt. ii., 96.

bi-ŏ-phy'-tŭm, s. [Gr. βιος (bios) = life, and φυτον (phuton) = a plant, φυω (phuō) = to bring forth.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Oxalidaceæ (Oxalids). The Biophytum sensitivum (Sensitive Biophytum) has pinnated leaves, irritable or sensitive. It is a very pretty annual.

bi-ŏ-plăsm, s. [Gr. βίος (bios) = life, course of life, and πλάσμα (plasma) = that which is capable of being fashioned, an image; from πλάσσω (plassō) = to form, mould, or shape.]

Biol.: A term introduced by Prof. Lionel S Beale, M.B., F.R.S., to designate forming, living, or germinal matter; the living matter of living beings. The term protoplasm had been previously used in an analogous sense, but Dr. Beale felt precluded from adopting it by the fact that it was used by most writers, and notably by Professor Huxley, in a widely extended sense, so as to require the introduction of a word more limited in signification. It is distinguished from formed matter; indeed, the extension of the one and that of the other occur under different and often opposite conditions. All the organs of the body come from bioplasm. (Beale: Bioplasm, 1872.)

bi-ŏ-plăst, s. [Gr. βίος (bios) = course of life, and πλαστός (plastos) = formed, moulded; from πλάσσω (plassō) = to form, to mould.]

Biol.: A little nucleus of germinal matter, many of which are scattered through the tissues of the body. It is from these that the growth of new matter proceeds. In the process of healing of a wound near the surface of the body, "lymph" is poured out, in which may be found bioplasts which have descended from white blood corpuscles. Of these, some produce epithelium, others fibrous connective tissue, unless they be too freely nourished, in which case they grow and multiply rapidly, and no kind of tissue whatever results, but pus is alone formed. (Beale: Bioplasm, § 60, 133.)

bi ŏsc'-ŏ-py, s. The diagnosis of life and death, as by means of an electric current.

bi'-ŏ-tine, bi-ŏ-tī'-ne, s. [Ital. biotina, From Biot, a French naturalist.] A mineral, called also Anorthite (q.v.).

bi'-ŏ-tite, s. [Named after Biot, a French naturalist; suffix -ite.]

Min.: A hexagonal and an optically uniaxial mineral, formerly called Magnesia Mica, Hexagonal Mica, and Uniaxial Mica. It exists in tabular prisms, in disseminated scales, or in massive aggregations of cleavable scales. Colour: silvery-white, rarely bottle-green, and by transmitted light, often fiery-red. Composition a good deal varies. One specimen had silica, 40·00; alumina, 16·16; sesquioxide of iron, 7·50; oxide of manganese, 2·54; potassa, 10·83; water, 3·0; iron, 0·50; and titanic acid, 0·2. Rubellan is an altered biotite and Eukamptite one of a hydrous type. (Dana.)

* bi-o-vac, s. [Bivouac.] (Glossog. Nov.) bip'-ar-ous, a. [Lat. prefix bi = two, and pario = to bring forth, to bear.] Bringing forth two at a birth. (Johnson.) bi-par'-ted, † by-par-ted, a. [Lat. prefix bi = two, and Eng. parted (q.v.).] Divided into two.

Her.: The same as parted (q.v.).

bi-par'-ti-ble, a. [In Fr. bipartible. From Lat. bipartio = to divide into two parts. Lat. pref. bi = two, and partibilis = divisible, partio = to share, to part; pars = a part.]

Bot.: Capable of being parted in two. Example: the Calyx of Protea.

bi-par'-ti-ent, a. & s [Lat. bipartiens, * pr. par. of bipartio.] [See Bipartible.]

A. As adjective: Dividing into two parts without leaving a remainder. (Gloss. to N.)

¶ A bipartient number: The same as B. substantive (q.v.).

B. As substantive: A number which divides another into two equal parts without leaving a fraction. Thus 4 is a bipartient of 8, and 25 of 50.

bi-par'-tile, a. [From Lat. prefix bi, part, & suffix -ile.] Bipartible, which may be divided into two. (Martyn.) bi-par'-tite, a. [In Ital. bipartito; from Lat. bipartitus, pa. par. of bipartio = to divide into two parts: prefix bi = two, and partio = to share, to part; pars = a part. In Fr. bipartí.] Divided into two, biparted. Used—

1. Spec.: Of things material.

"His [Alexander's] empire was bipartite into Asia and Syria."—Gregory: Posthuma, p. 143.

2. Fig.: Of things not material.

"The divine fate is also bipartite; some things suppose [God both to decree and to do all things in us (evil as well as good), or by his immediate influence to determine all actions, and so make them as necessary to us."—Cudworth: Intellectual Syst., Pref., p. 5.

Bot.: Parted in two from the apex almost but not quite to the base. Applied to leaves, &c.

† bi-par-ti'-tion, s. [In Fr. bipartition; from Lat. bipartitum, supine of bipartio = to divide into two parts; prefix bi = two, and partio = to share, to part; pars = a part.] The act or operation of dividing into two parts. The state of being so divided. (Glossog. Nov., 2nd edition, 1719.)

† bi-pă'-tent, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and Eng. patent.] Open on both sides. (Glossog. Nov.)

bi-peche, bi-pe-chen (pa. par. bipeht), v.t. [A.S. bepsian; pa. par. bepeht = to deceive, or seduce.] To deceive. (O. Eng. Hom., i. 91.)

bi-pĭc'-tĭn-ate, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and pectinatus = sloped two opposite ways, like a comb; pecten = a comb; pecto = to comb.]

Bot., &c.: Having two margins each pectinate, i.e., toothed like a comb. (Webster.) bi'-ped, a. & s. [In Fr. bipède; Port. bipede. From Lat. prefix bi = two, and pes, genit. pedis = foot.]

A. As adjective: Having two feet.

"By which the man, when heavenly life was ceased, Became a helpless, naked, biped beast."
Byron: An Epistle. (Richardson.)

B. As substantive: A man or other being walking on two feet as contradistinguished from a quadruped walking on four.

"No serpent or fishes oviparous, have any stones at all, neither biped nor quadruped oviparous have any osteocolla."—Browne: Vulgar Errours.

bi-pĕd-al, bip'-ĕd-al, a. [In Fr. bipédal; from Lat. bipes, genit. bipedis = two-footed.] [Biped.] Having two feet.

"... in this case it would have become either more strictly quadruped or bipedal."—Darwin: Descent of Man, Pt. I., ch. iv.

bi-pĕl'-tă-tę, s. pl. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and pelta; Gr. πέλτη (peltē) = a small, light shield of leather, without a rim. It was generally crescent-shaped.]

Zool.: Cuvier's name for a family of Crustaceans, one of two making up the order Stomapoda. It was so called because the testa is divided into two bucklers, whereas in the other family, the Unipeltata, there is but one. The former is now generally called Phyllosomidæ, and the latter Squillidæ, whilst a third family, the Mysidæ, has been placed with them under the Stomapoda. (See these terms.)

bi-pĕl'-tāte, a. [Bipeltata.]

Zool.: Having a covering like two small shields, or like a double shield.

bi-pĕn'-nāte, bi-pĕn-nā'-tĕd, a. [From Latin prefix bi, and pennatus = feathered, winged. Compare also bipennis = having two wings; bi = two, and penna = a feather, a wing.]

1. Zool.: Having two wings.

"All bipennated insects have pelses joined to the body."—Derham.

*2. Bot.: The same as Bipinnated (q.v.).

bi-pĕn-nāt-I-par'-tĕd, a. [From Latin prefix bi = two, and Eng. pennati-parted (q.v.).]

Bot.: Twice pennati-parted, doubly divided into partings or partitions—applied to the venation of a leaf and its lobings. (Lindley: Introd. to Bot.)

bi-pĕn-nāt-I-sĕc-tĕd, a. [From Lat. pref. bi = two, and Eng. pennatisected (q.v.).] The same as bipennati-parted, except that the double divisions are into segments instead of into partitions. (Lindley: Introd. to Bot.) bi-pĕn-nis, s. [Lat. bipennis, as adj. = having two edges; as subst. = an axe with two edges, a double-axe; from prefix bi, and penna = a feather; another form of pinna = a feather, a wing.] A two-edged axe, a battle-axe.

bi-pĕs, s. [Lat. bipes = two-footed; from prefix bi = two, and pes = foot.]

1. Zool. Lizard: A name given to a lizard from the Cape of Good Hope—the Anguis bipes of Linnæus, the Scelotes bipes of Gray.

2. Zool.: A genus of reptiles, belonging to the order Sauria, and the family Gymnophthalmidæ. The hinder legs are imperfect, and thus the first step is taken towards their disappearance in the Ophidia (Serpents), to which these lizards are closely akin. Some species are now transferred to the genus Pygopus (q.v.). Example: Bipes lepidopodus, Lacepède, now Pygopus lepidopodus. It is from Australia.

bi-pĕt'-al-oŭs, a. [From prefix bi = two, and Lat. petalum = a metal plate. From Gr. πέταλον (petalon) = a leaf, a petal, a plate of metal.] [Petal.]

Bot.: Having two petals in the flower.

bĭ phôr'-a, bi-phôr'-ęs, s. pl. [From Lat. prefix bi, and Gr. φέρω (pherō); the same as Lat. fero = to bear.]

Zool.: An order of Tunicated Molluscoids, consisting of free-swimming animals, transparent as glass, and having an aperture at each end of their tubular body, the one for the ingress and the other for the exit of water. The typical genus is Salpa. The nearest affinity of the Biphora is with the Ascidians. [Ascidia.]

bi-pin'-nāte, bi-pin-nā'-tĕd, a. [From Lat. prefix bi, and Eng. pinnated. Lat. prefix bi = two, and pinnatus = feathered; pinna = a feather.]

BIPINNATE LEAF.

Bot.: The term used when the leaflets of a pinnate leaf are themselves pinnate. A great many of the Acacias which constitute so marked a feature in tropical jungles have beautifully bipinnate leaves; so also have their near allies, the Mimosas.

bi-pin-nāt'-I-fĭd, * bi-pĭn-nāt'-I-fĭd, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two; and Eng. pinnatifid, pennatifid (q.v.).]

Bot.: Twice pinnatifid. The term used when the lobes or sinuations of a pinnatifid leaf are themselves pinnatifid.

bĭ-plĭ'-oāte, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and plicatus = folded; pa. par. plico = to fold.]

Bot.: Twice folded together. (Henslow.)

† bi-plĭç'-I-tў, s. [From Lat. biplex, genit. biplicis = double, and Eng. suffix -ity.] The state of being twice folded, reduplication. (Roget.)

bĭ-pō'-lar, a. [From prefix bi = two, and polar (q.v.).] Doubly polar. (Coleridge.)

Bĭ'-pont, Bi-pŏn'-tine, a. [From Lat. bipontinus = pertaining to Bipontium, now Zweibrücken, in Bavaria.]

Biblio.: Relating to books published at Bipontium. (See etym.)

* biprene, bipreone, v.t. [A.S. pref. bi, and preon = a clasp, a bodkin.] To pin, to tag; to fasten down. (N.E.D.) bĭ-pŭ'nc-tāte, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and punctatus = punctus = a puncture, with suffix -ate.] [Punctate.]

Entom., &c.: Having two punctures.

bi-pŭnc-tu-al, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and punctus = a puncture, . . . a point, with suffix -al.] [Puncture.] Having two points. (Maunder.) bi-pū'-pĭl-lāte, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and pupilla = (1) an orphan girl; (2) the pupil of the eye.]

Entom.: Having two pupil-like markings, differing in colour in the ocellus of a butterfly's wing.

bi-quăd'-rāte, s. [In Ger. biquadrat. Lat. prefix bi = two, and quadratus = squared, square; quadro = to make square; quadrum = a square; quatuor = four.] The fourth power of a number or quantity. [Biquadratic.]

"Biquadrate, the fourth power in algebra, arising from the multiplication of a square number or quantity by itself."—Glossary Nor.

bi-quăd-rāt'-ic, a. & s. [In Fr. biquadratique; Port. biquadrado.] [Biquadrate.]

A. As adjective (Arith., Alg., &c.): Twice squared, i.e., squared, and then squared again; raised to the fourth power; containing such a fourth power, or pertaining to that which does so. [See the compound terms which follow.]

B. As substantive (Arith., Alg., &c.): The fourth power; that is, the square multiplied by the square. Thus x^4 is the biquadratic of x, and $a^4 + 4a^3b + 6a^2b^2 + 4ab^3 + b^4$ is the biquadratic of $a + b$.

biquadratic equation. An equation containing the fourth power of the unknown quantity in it, whether with or without the powers less than the fourth. Thus $x^4 + 3x + 4 = 2x^2 - x^3$ is a biquadratic equation.

biquadratic parabola. A curve of the third order, having two infinite legs tending in the same direction.

biquadratic root. The square root of a square root; the square root of a number, and then its square root again extracted. Thus 2 is the biquadratic root of 16, because $\sqrt{16} = 4$, and $\sqrt{4} = 2$.

* bi-quash, v.t. [Quash.] To be rent in pieces.

"And al biquashed the roche."—P. Plowman, 13,371.

* bi-quĕ'-st, s. [Bequest.]

* bi-que-then, v.t. [From A.S. be, and cwithan = to speak or moan in grief, to mourn, to lament.] To bewail.

"And smeren, and winden and biquethen,
And waken is sithen xl night."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 2,448-9.

bi-quin'-tile, s. [Lat. bi = two, and quintilis = pertaining to the fifth month of the old Roman year, afterwards July; quintus = the fifth; quinque = five.]

Astrol.: An aspect of the planets, first noted by Kepler, when their distance from each other is $\frac{2}{5}$ of a circle, i.e., 144°. (Glossog. Nov.)

* bi-quna'd, pret. of v. [From pref. bi, and A.S. cwethan = to say, tell.] [Bequeath.] Ordered, appointed.

"God bi-quaad watras here stede."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 117.

* bir, * bur, s. [O. Icel. byrr.] Rage, fury.

"To him I e stirt with bir ful grim."
Iwaine and Gawaine, 1,661.

bi-rā'-dĭ-āte, bi-rā'-dĭ-ā-tĕd, a. [From Lat. bi = two, and radiatus, pa. par. of radio = to furnish with spokes or rays; radius = . . . a spoke, a ray.] Having two rays.

birch, * birche, * bêrche, * bürche, * birke (Eng.), birk (Scotch), s. & a. [A.S. beorc, birce, byrce; O. Icel. björk; Sw. björk; Dan. birk, birke-træ; Dut. berk; (N. H.) Ger. birke; M. H. Ger. birche, birke; O. H. Ger. bircha, piricha; Russ. berezu; Pol. brzoza; Serv. breze; Lith. berzas, all = birch. Skeat quotes from Benfey Sanse. bhûrja = a kind of birch, the leaves or bark of which were used for writing on.] [Byrhe.]

A. As substantive:

1. The English name of the trees and shrubs belonging to the botanical genus Betula (q.v.). Two species occur wild in Britain, the Common Birch (Betula alba) and the Dwarf Birch (B. nana). The Common Birch has ovate-deltoid, acute, doubly serrate leaves. Its flowers are in catkins, which come forth in April and May. It grows best in heathy soils and in alpine districts. The Drooping or Weeping Birch (B. pendula) is a variety of this tree. It grows wild on the European continent and in Asia. The wood of the birch is tough and white. It is used for making brooms; it is often burned into charcoal; twigs are by many employed for purposes of castigation. The oil obtained from the white rind is used in tanning Russia leather. [Birch-oil.] The Russians turn it to account also as a vermifuge and as a balsam in the cure of wounds. In some countries the bark of the birch is made into hats and drinking-cups. The Betula nana, or Dwarf Birch, grows in the Highlands of Scotland, in Lapland, &c. It is a small shrub, one or two feet high. The Laplander uses the wood for fuel, and the leaves, spread over with a reindeer's skin, for a bed. B. lenta is the Mahogany Birch. Mountain Mahogany, Sweet Birch, or Cherry Birch of North America. Its leaves are fragrant, and have been used as a substitute for tea. The Canoe Birch, of which the North American Indians construct their portable canoes, is the B. papyracea.

2. A rod of birch used for castigation.

"Why not go to Westminster or Eton at once, man, and take to Lilly's Grammar and Accidence and to the birch, too, if you like it?"—Scott: R. Roy, ch. ii.

B. As adjective or in composition: Of or belonging to the tree described under A. (See the compounds which follow.)

¶ Lady Birch: A name for Betula alba, Lin. [Birch.] (Lyte, Prior, &c.)

Silver Birch: Betula alba, Lin. (Lyte, Prior.)

West Indian Birch: A terebinthaceous tree, Bursera gummifera. (Treas. of Bot.)

birch-besprinkled, a. Besprinkled with birch. (Used poetically of cliffs.)

birch-camphor, birch campher, s. A resinous substance obtained from the bark of the Black Birch (Betula nigra).

birch-oil, s. An oil extracted from the bark of the birch-tree. It is used in the preparation of Russia leather, to which it imparts a certain fragrance, whilst at the same time protecting it from becoming mouldy or being attacked by insects.

birch wine, birchen-wine, s. Wine made from the vernal juice of the birch.

"She boasts no charms divine, Yet she can carve and make birch wine."
T. Warton: Progr. of Discontent.

¶ Other obvious compounds are: Birch-broom, Birch-canoe (Longfellow: Song of Hiawatha, xiii.), birch-grove, birch-leaf (Ibid., iii.), birch-rod, birch-tree, &c.

birch, v.t. [From birch, s.] To chastise with a birch rod; to flog.

birched, pa. par. & a. [Birch, v.]

† bir'-chen (Eng.), bir-ken (Scotch), a. [A.S. beorcen, bircen, byrcen; Dut. berken; Ger. birken.] Pertaining to birch; composed of birch; made of birch. (Gradually becoming obsolete, its place being supplied by the substantive birch used adjectively.) [Birken.]

"She sate beneath the birchen tree."
Scott: The Lady of the Lake, iv. 27.

* bir'-chin, a. The same as Birchen (q.v.).

Birchin Lane, * Birchen Lane, * Burchen Lane, * Birching Lane, s.

1. (Of the three first forms): A lane or street in the City of London in which second-hand or ready-made clothes were formerly sold. It is one of the lanes connecting Cornhill and Lombard Street, and is much more aristocratic in its character than in the olden time. Stow says the name is a corruption from Birchover, the first builder and owner thereof.

"His discourse makes not his behaviour, but he buyes it at court, as countreymen their clothes in Birchin-lane."—Overbury's Char., 17, of a fine Gent. (Nares.)

* 2. Of the form Birching Lane: A cant term for a place where one is to receive a whipping. (Ascham.) [Birch, v.t.]

¶ To send one to Birching Lane: To send one to be whipped. (Nares.) birch-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [Birch, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & participial adj.: In a sense corresponding to that of the verb.

C. As subst.: The act of chastising with a birch twig.

birch-wood, s. & a. [Eng. birch; wood.]

A. As substantive:

1. A wood consisting of birches.

"Foyers came headlong down through the birch-wood with the same leap and the same roar."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

2. The wood of the birch-tree.

B. As adjective:

1. Pertaining to a wood or forest of birch.

"strewn o'er it thick as the birch-wood leaves."
Hemans: Battle of Morgarten

2. Made of, or in any way pertaining to, the wood of the birch-tree.

birch-wort, s. [Eng. birch, and -worts, pl. suffix.] [Wort.]

Bot.: The name given by Lindley to his order Betulaceæ (q.v.).

bird (1), * byrde, * berde, * bridde, * bryd (Scotch), s. & a. [Mid. Eng. brid, rarely byrde (by letter change from the first form); A.S. brid = a bird, especially the young of birds. There is no evidence as to its remote etymology. Skeat connects it with A.S. brédan = to breed; from which Murray dissents.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

† (1) In the Anglo-Saxon sense of the term: The young of any animal; a brood.

* (a) The young of any feathered flying biped; a chicken.

"As that ungentle gull, the cuckoo's bird, Useth the sparrow."
Shakesp.: Hen. IV., v. 1.

* (b) The young of any other animal.

* (c) A child.

"With my bretes my brid I fed."
Holy Rood (ed. Morris), p. 123.

(2) A feathered flying biped.

(a) Gen.: Any feathered flying biped, great or small, old or young.

"... and all the birds of the heavens were fled."—Jer. iv. 25.

(b) Spec.: A small feathered flying biped, as distinguished from a large one, the latter being called a fowl. Also especially applied in sporting phraseology to game—e.g., partridges. (Colloquial.)

2. Fig.: As a term of endearment or otherwise.

(1) A lady. Spec., a young lady, a girl, so called probably, not only from her youth [A 1. (1)], but also from her beauty, her lightness of movement, her ability to sing sweetly, and her liveliness of demeanour. (Chiefly Scotch.)

"Lord John stood in his stable door,
Said he was boun to ride,
Bard Ellen stood in her bower door,
Said she'd rin by his side."
Jamieson: Popular Ball., i. 117.

(2) An appellation for a man from a woman who loves him. [C. Bird of Arabia.]

(3) An appellation given to a man by one who believes him too soaring in his ambition. [C. Bird of the Mountain.]

II. Technically:

1. Zool.: The English designation of the Aves, the second class of the sub-kingdom Vertebrata, standing between the Mammalia (Mammals) above, and the Reptilia (Reptiles) below. Whilst in their warm blood they are more closely akin to the former than to the latter, they approach the latter rather than the former in various points of anatomical structure, especially in their lower limbs. [Ornithoscelida.] They agree also with Reptiles, Amphibia, and Fishes in being oviparous, whilst the Mammalia bring forth their young alive and suckle them for a time. Birds are feathered bipeds, with wings used by all but a few aberrant species for flight. To facilitate this, air cells communicating with the lungs permeate the larger bones, and even the huge bills of the hornbill, toucan, &c., the effect being greatly to diminish their weight. The circulation is rapid, the blood warmer than in other vertebrates, and the energy, consequently, great. A bird consists of a head, a body, and limbs, the latter term including the legs, tail, and wings. In the subjoined figure—a is the bill.

b ,, the front (frons).
c ,, the crown or summit (vertex).
d ,, the ear.
e ,, the nape of the neck (nuchæ).
f ,, the back or interscapular region.
g ,, the lower back (terga).
h is the rump (uropygium), the part where the tail feathers are inserted.
i ,, the tail.
k ,, the legs.
l ,, the wings.
m ,, the belly (abdomen).
n ,, the breast.
o ,, the throat.
p ,, the chin.

¶ For more minute details see Bill, Leg, Wing, Tail, &c.

Linnæus divided Birds into six orders, Accipitres, Picæ, Anseres, Grallæ, Gallinæ, and Passeres. All of these, except Picæ, are still retained under different names. Cuvier, in 1817, recognised six orders, Accipitres, Passeres, Scansores, Gallinæ, Grallæ, and Palmipedes. Vigors, in 1825, adopted the quinary arrangement into Raptores, Insessores, Rasores, Grallatores, and Natatores. Owen, in 1866, made seven orders: Natatores, Grallatores, Rasores, Cantatores, Volitores, and Raptores; and Huxley, in 1864, separated Birds into Saururæ, containing only the Archæopteryx; the Ratitæ, including the Ostrich and its allies; and the Carinatæ, comprehending all ordinary birds. Dallas (following Vogt's arrangement of 1851) divided Birds into two sections, the Autophagi, in which the young birds are capable of feeding themselves from the moment of leaving the egg, and the Insessores, in which the young remain in the nest till they are completely fledged, being fed meanwhile by the parents. The former section contains four orders, the Natatores (Swimmers), the Grallatores (Wading Birds), the Cursores (Runners), and the Rasores (Gallinaceous Birds). The Insessorial section also contains four orders, the Columbæ (Pigeons), the Scansores (Climbing Birds), the Passeres (Perchers), and the Raptores (Birds of Prey). In A.D. 1711, Ray estimated the birds known and described at "near 500." In 1835, Mr. Swainson conjectured that the species, known and unknown, might be about 6,800. There are more than 10,000 species of birds, some confined to narrow localities, others widely distributed. Of these, a considerable proportion belong to the United States, either as summer visitors or as yearly residents.

2. Palæont.: In certain triassic strata in Connecticut there are "ornithichnites," or fossil footprints like those which birds would leave upon the mud or fine sand over which they walked. [Footprints, Ornithichnites.] The number of joints in each of the three toes is precisely the same as in modern birds; notwithstanding which some think the impressions may be those of Deinosaurian reptiles, of which remains have been found in the same strata. The oldest bird, of which the actual fossil skeleton has been obtained, comes from the lithographic slate of upper oolitic age, quarried at Solenhofen in Bavaria. It is the Archæopteryx of Owen (q.v.). Three specimens of it are known at present, one in Bavaria, the second in the British Museum of Natural History, South Kensington, whilst the third is in the Berlin University Museum, for which it was purchased from Herr Haberlein for 80,000 marks, or about £4,000. The finest specimen of Archæopteryx has been examined by Professor Carl Vogt, who considers that it is neither bird nor reptile, but something intermediate between the two, or to be more specific, that while a bird in its integument and hinder limbs, it is a reptile in all the rest of its organisation. Bones of those of birds exist in the Wealden, which has much wavered as to whether they were true birds or flying reptiles [Pterodactyle]; there is, however, what appears to be a genuine bird in the Greensand. Prof. Marsh found in the Cretaceous rocks of America two remarkable genera of birds, the Hesperornis and the Ichthyornis, the former furnished with true teeth in a groove, and the latter having them lodged in sockets. In these respects they approach reptiles, but as which the Ichthyornis, like reptiles, has its vertebræ concave at each end. Of tertiary birds Owen, in 1846, established four species from the London clay, described from four or five fragments of bones and skulls found in that eocene deposit. These included a parrot, a kingfisher, and an ostrich. Bones of birds have been met with somewhat plentifully in the Paris gypsum and the Lacustrine limestone of the Limagne d'Auvergne, both freshwater strata of eocene age. Even in the eocene beds of France have been ascertained at seventy species, among others, parrots, trogons, flamingoes, secretary birds, and many storks, suggesting the present fauna of South Africa. There are birds in the miocene of the Sewalik hills in India. Of post-tertiary species the finest, and also the best known, are the gigantic Moas from New Zealand, which seem to have been contemporary with man, but now they are extinct. The yet more massive Æpyornis, the eggs of which are more than thirteen inches in diameter, and equal in capacity to 148 hens' eggs, is found in the alluvial deposits in Madagascar. Thus few fossil birds are known, and those few are mostly from tertiary or post-tertiary rocks.

3. Her.: Birds are regarded, some as emblems of the more active, and others as of the contemplative life. Among the terms applied to them are Membered, Armed, and Vulned (q.v.). When birds are mentioned in blazon without expressing their species, they should be drawn in the form of the Heraldic Eagle (Gloss. of Her.).

B. As adjective: Of, belonging to, or like a bird. (See the compounds which follow.)

C. In special phrases.

BIRD-BOLT.

bird-bolt [1], s.

1. Lit.: A short arrow with a broad flat end, used to kill bird without piercing them. (Lit. & fig.) It is sometimes represented in heraldry.

2. Fig.: That which suits one's heart or reputation without deeply penetrating either.

"To be generous, guiltless, and of free disposition, is to take those things for bird-bolts that you deem cannon bullets . . ."—Shakesp. Twelfth Night, i. 5.

"Ignorance should shoot
His gross-kin bird bird-bolt Marston: What you will  bird bolt (2), s. A corruption of one of the English names for the Burbot (q.v.).

bird-cage, s. A cage for birds. It is generally made with wooden bottom and posts, and with wire, or, if large, sometimes with wicker-work bars on the sides and top.

"At the door he hung the bird-cage Longfellow: The Song of Hiawatha, xii.

bird-call, s.

1. A little stick, cleft at one end, on which is put a leaf of some plant, for imitating the cry of birds. (Goodrich & Porter.)

2. A short metallic cylinder, with a circular perforated plate at each end, used to make a trilling noise, as a decoy for birds.

bird-catcher, s. One whose occupation it is to catch birds.

. . . and indeed, concluded the critic, "from his fondness for flowers and for birds, I would venture to guess at that a florist or a bird-catcher is a much more suitable calling for him than a poet."—Moore: L. E. (Light of the Harem).

1. As subst.: The art, operation, or occupation of catching birds. This is one of the regular callings of the London poor. In Egypt it is said that it was carried on to such an extent that the birds became comparatively scarce, but since this "open space" has become public property bird-catching has been forbidden. Among the birds caught are the linnet, the bullfinch, the goldfinch, the chaffinch, the greenfinch, the lark, the nightingale, &c. Mr. Henry Mayhew calculates that one man, who practised the trade for sixty years, must have caught, first and last, about 312,000 birds. The general method adopted is the employment of a decoy-bird and a net. [BIRD-NET.]

2. As adj.: Pertaining to the catching of birds; a bird-catching apparatus.

bird-cherry, s. A small tree (the Prunus padus, &c.), wild in Britain, especially in its northern parts. It has pendulous racemes of white flowers, which appear in May, and are succeeded by small black drupaceous cherry-like fruits. (Hooker and Arnott.) bird-class, s. A class for teaching birds to imitate the notes of an instrument. There are generally about seven birds in a class. The principle is to shut the class up in a dark room, half-deserving the performers till they imitate the instrument, and gradually let in light upon them and partially feed them as a reward for singing. Learning to associate the singing with the gradual appearance of light and the exhibition of food, they sing to obtain these necessaries. (Mayhew.) bird-conjurer, * brydd-coniuerer, s. A diviner by means of birds, an augur.

"Thes gentils . . . brydd-coniurers and dyvynours."—Wycliffe: Deut. xviii. 14.

bird-diviner, * brid-deuyner, s. The same as BIRD-CONJURER.

"Deuynours as . . . bridde-deuyneres."—Wycliffe: Jer. xxvii. 9.

bird-duffer, s. A vulgar name for one who sells a brightly-coloured and expensive bird, which is found to be a common one of dull hue painted for sale. The species commonly operated upon is the female greenfinch, its light-coloured plumage adapting it for such a purpose. (Mayhew.)

bird-eye, a. [BIRD'S-EYE.]

bird-eyed, a. Having eyes like those of a bird, that is, possessed of piercing sight

"Stud, 'tis the horse-start out o the brown study—Rather the bird-eyed stroke, sir."
B. Jonson: Cynthia's Revels

bird-fancier, s. One who fancies birds (Used either of an amateur, or of one who makes a livelihood by trapping, keeping, and selling birds.)

bird-grass, s. The name given by seedsmen and others to a grass—the Poa trivialis, L.

bird house, s. An open box for birds, set upon a long pole, to keep it out of the way of cats. It is erected by those who, liking birds, wish to minister to their convenience.

bird-lice, s. pl. The English name given to the small parasites so frequently seen infesting birds. Naturalists place them in the insect order Mallophaga, in immediate proximity to the Anoplura, which contains the human pediculi. [MALLOPHAGA.]

bird-like, a. Like a bird. (Used specially of a life too much confined.)

"For when I see, how they do mount on high,
Waving their out-stretched wings at liberty,
Then do I think how birdlike in a cage
My life I lead, and grief can never assuage."
Nicolas: Mir. for Magistrates, p. 683.

bird-lime, s.

1. Lit.: A substance whitish and limy in appearance. (Used, as its name implports, for capturing birds.) It is in general manufactured from the bark of the holly, though the berries of the mistletoe, and also the bark, boiled in water, beaten in a mortar, and then mashed, may also be employed for the purpose

"Holly is of so viscous a juice, as they make birdlime of the bark of it."—Bacon: Natural History

2. Fig.: Anything fitted to ensnare one, or restrain his departure from a place.

"Heavy as birdlime wraps me round and glues my wings."
Dryden.

bird-limed, a. Smeared with bird-lime. (Lit. & fig.)

"I love not those 'viscous beneficia,' those birdlimed kindnesses which Pliny speaks of."—Howell: Letters, v. 18.

bird-loops, s. pl. The bars in a bird's cage.

"To keep the unbold'ning the air close captive That were created to be . . . eedom: surely
The muscles creditor took his first light,
And prisons their first models, from such bird-loops."
Shirley: The Bird in a Cage, iv. 1.

bird-mouthed, a. Mealy-mouthed; not liking to say anything unpleasant, even when it should be done.

"Ye're o'er bird-mouth'd."
Ramsay: S. Prov., p. 86. (Jamieson.)

bird-net, s. A net used for catching birds. It is about twelve yards square, and laid flat on the ground, to which it is affixed by four iron pins, its sides remaining loose. Upon it is put a cage with a decoy-bird in it, given to singing cheerfully. When other birds congregate around it, the man, who has been lying flat on his face twenty or thirty yards off, pulls a string, which makes the loose sides of the net collapse and fly together, imprisoning the birds around the cage. (Mayhew.) bird-organ, s. A small organ used in teaching birds to sing.

bird-pepper, s. The fruit of a plant, the Capsicum baccatum. When ripe it is gathered, dried in the sun, pounded, and mixed with salt. Afterwards it is preserved in bottles with stoppers, and is called Cayenne pepper bird seed, s. A name sometimes given to heads of Plantain, Plantago major (Linn.), and to Canary Grass, Phalaris canariensis (Linn.), from their being given to birds for food. (Prior, p. 22.)

bird-spider, s. A genus of spiders—the Mygale, and specially the M. avicularia, a large species inhabiting Surinam, which, as both its English and its scientific names import, was formerly believed to catch birds [MYGALE.]

† bird-swindler, s. [BIRD-DUFFER.]

bird-trap, s. A two-winged flap-net sprung by hand, or a box-trap supported on a figure-of-four, with a trigger to be touched by the bird, or sprung by a person on watch. The netting of birds by the former method is well pictured in the ancient Egyptian paintings. (Knight.) The trap was generally made of net work, strained over a frame. It consisted of two semi-circular sides or flaps of equal sizes, one or both moving on the common bar or axis upon which they rested. When the trap was set, the two flaps were kept open by means of strings, probably of catgut, which the moment the bait that stood in the centre of the bar was touched, slipped aside, and allowed the two sides to collapse, and thus secured the bird. The Egyptian nets were very similar to those used in Europe at the present day, but probably larger, and requiring a greater number of persons to manage, which may be attributed to an imperfection in their contrivance for closing them.

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN BIRD-TRAP.
(From "Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians")

bird-witted, a. Tending to roam from subject to subject; destitute of concentrativeness, without fixity of attention.

bird's-bill, s. A plant (Trigonella ornithorhynchus) bird's-bread, s. A name for a plant—Sedum acre, which the French call by the corresponding term Pain d'oiseau. It is not known why the name is given.

bird's-eye, bird's-eyes, bird-eye, bird-een (Scotch een's = Eyes), s. & a.

A. As substantive:

1. Zool. & Ord. Lang. (lit.): The eye or eyes of a bird.

2. Bot: The name of several plants with small bright, usually blue flowers.

(1) A widely-diffused name for Veronica chamædrys

(2) A name for a plant, called more fully the Bird's-eye Primrose. It is the Primula farinosa. It has pale lilac flowers with a yellow eye. The whole plant is powdered with a substance smelling like musk. It grows in the north of England, or rarely in Scotland.

(3) A name sometimes given to the Adonis autumnalis, and indeed to the whole genus Adonis, more commonly designated "Pheasant's eye."

¶ American Bird's-eye: A plant—Primula pusilla. (Treas. of Bot.)

3. A variety of manufactured tobacco, in which the ribs of the leaves are cut along with the fibre.

B. As adjective:

1. Resembling a bird's-eye, as "Bird's-eye primrose" (q.v.).

2. Seen as a landscape might be by a bird flying over a country—i.e., seen from above. A Bird's-eye view (q.v.).

Bird's-eye maple: A North American tree—Acer saccharinum, called also the Sugar-maple. [ACER, SUGAR-MAPLE.]

Bird's-eye Primrose: The same as Bird's-eye, A, 2 (2).

Bird's-eye view, Bird-eye view: A view such as must present itself to a bird flying over a country, and consequently looking at the landscape from above. Though a country represented in this way on a map has its prominent features exaggerated, yet to the unimaginative it gives a more lively and even a more correct view of the country than ordinary representations or maps of the normal type could do. (Lit. & fig.)

"Viewing from the Pisgah of his pulpit the free, moral, happy, flourishing, and glorious state of France, as in a bird-eye landscape of a promised land."—Burke on the French Revolution.

"That government being so situated, as to have a large range of prospect, and as it were a bird's-eye view of everything."—Burke: Letter to Thomas Burgh, Esq.

1. In Zool. (Lit.): The foot of a bird.

Bird's-foot Star, Bird's-foot Sea-star:

Zool.: Palmipes membranaceus, a British echinoderm.

2. In Botany:

(1) The English name of the Ornithopus, a genus of papilionaceous plants. There is a British species—the Ornithopus perpusillus, or Common Bird's-foot. It is so called from its long seed-pods, which resemble bird's feet. It has pinnate leaves with 6–9 pairs of terminal leaflets. The flowers are white, with red lines. It is found in Scotland. O. sativus, or the Serradilla Bird's-foot, introduced from Portugal about 1818, has proved a most valuable fodder-plant.

(2) A plant—Euphorbia ornithopus. (Treas. of Bot.)

Bird's-foot clover: Withering's name for the Bird's-foot Trefoil (q.v.).

Bird's-foot Trefoil: The English name of the Lotus—a genus of papilionaceous plants, with trifoliolate leaves, umbellate flowers, and legumes with a tendency to be divided into many cells. Three species—the L. corniculatus, or Common, the L. major, or Narrow-leaved, and the L. angustissimus, or Slender bird's-foot, Trefoil—occur in Britain. The first-named plant is very common, enlivening pastures all through the country and the sea-coast everywhere with its yellow flowers.

bird's-knotgrass, s. A book-name for a plant, Polygonum aviculare (Linn.).

1. Lit.: The mouth of a bird.

2. Carp.: The notch at the foot of a rafter where it rests upon and against the plate.

bird's-nest, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

I. Lit.: The nest of a bird. Those of the several species vary in their minor details so as to be in most cases quite distinguishable from each other. One of the street-trades of London is the selling of bird's-nests.

"On the . . . wet sellers of bird's-nests."—Mayhew: London Lab. . . ., iii. 82.

¶ Edible bird's-nests are nests built by the Collocalia esculenta, and certain other species of swallows inhabiting Sumatra, Java, China, and some other parts of the East. The nests, which are deemed a luxury by the Chinese, are formed of a mucilaginous substance, secreted by the birds themselves from their salivary glands.

II. Figuratively and technically:

1. Either the popular or book-names of several plants.

† (1) The Wild Carrot, Daucus Carot. (Linn.)

"The whole tuft [of flowers] is drawn together when the seed is ripe, resembling a birde's-nest; wherupon it hath beene named of some bird's-nest."—Gerard: Herbal, 873.

(2) The Common Parsnip, Pastinaca sativa, L. (See Appendix.)

(3) The modern book-name of the genus Monotropa. (Hooker and Arnott.)

¶ Yellow Bird's-nest: Monotropa hypopitys.

(4) A fern: Asplenium (Thamnopteris) nidus.

¶ Bird's-nest Fungus: The common name for the species of Cyathus and Nidularia, two genera of fungi.

2. Naut.: A look-out station at a mast-head for a seaman sent up thither to watch for whales. [CROW'S-NEST.]

B. As adjective: Resembling a bird's nest; in any way pertaining to a bird's nest. [A., II. (5).]

Bird's-nest Orchis: One of the orchideæ, Neottia or Listera Nidus-avis, L. The English designation is a translation of the Latin Nidus-avis. The plant is so called from having its root composed of numerous fleshy fibres aggregated in a bird's-nest fashion. Gerard indicates the kind of nest which in his view it resembles, saying that it "hath many tangling rootes platted or crossed one over another verie intricately, which resembleth a crowe's nest made of stickes." It has dingy brown flowers growing in spikes, and is found in the northern parts of Britain.

birds of paradise, s. The English designation of a family of Conirostral birds—the Paradiseidæ. They are closely allied to the Corvidæ (Crows), with which, indeed, they are united by some writers. They have magnificent plumage, especially the males, who can moreover elevate quite a canopy of plumes behind their necks. When first discovered they were the subject of many myths. They were supposed to be perpetually on the wing, having no feet, a fable perpetuated by Linnæus in the name apoda or footless, given to the best-known and finest species. The fact was that the inhabitants of New Guinea, their native region, cut off the feet before selling them to Europeans. The fable of the Phœnix is believed to have been framed from myths current about the Birds of Paradise. [PHŒNIX.]

bird's-tare, s. A name given to a plant, genus Arachis.

bird's-tongue, s. A name given to various plants:—

1. Stellaria holostea. (Linn.: Ger. Apex.) Britten and Holland consider the name to have been founded on the shape of the leaves.

2. The fruit of the Ash-tree (Fraxinus excelsior), so called from the form thereof being like to a bird's-tongue. (Coles.)

3. A tree, Acer campestre, the common Maple. (Evelyn.)

4. Senecio paradoxus, the Great Fen Ragwort, a composite plant.

5. Anagallis arvensis, the Scarlet Pimpernel.

6. The book-name for a plant genus, Ornithoglossum, belonging to the order Melanthaceæ (Melanths.)

¶ Other obvious compounds are: Bird-connoisseur (Mayhew: London Labour and the London Poor); bird-lovers (Ibid.); bird-note (Hemans: Siege of Valentia); bird-stuffer, bird stuffing; bird-trade (Mayhew), &c.

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Gen.: Thin flour-cake which has been baked in the oven until it is hard and dried. There are many kinds of biscuits, but the basis of all is flour mixed with water or milk. In fancy biscuits sugar, butter, and flavouring ingredients are used. Plain biscuits are more nutritious than an equal weight of bread, but owing to their hardness and dryness, they should be more thoroughly masticated to ensure their easy digestion. When exposed to moisture, biscuits are apt to lose their brittleness and become mouldy, hence it is necessary to keep them in a dry atmosphere. Digestive biscuits consist almost entirely of bran, charcoal biscuits contain about ten per cent. of powdered vegetable charcoal. Meat biscuits, which are said to be very nutritious, contain either extract of meat, or lean meat which has been dried and ground to a fine powder. Ground roasted biscuits are sometimes used to adulterate coffee.

"In Greece there is no biscuet ..."—Lalor: Illustr. Brit. Hist., i. 169 (Richardson.)

"Many have been cured of dropsies ... by abstaining from drinks, eating dry biscuit, which ... quenches thirst, and strong frictions four or five times a day."—Arbuthnot on Diet.

2. Spec.: A kind of hard dry bread made to be used at sea. When designed for long voyages it is baked four times. The word biscuit is generally used in the singular as a noun of multitude.

"All the bakers of Rotterdam were employed night and night to make biscuit."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

II. Technically.

1. Porcelain-making: Any of pottery moulded and baked in an ov preparatory to the glazing and burning. In this condition, pottery is bibulous, but the glaze sinks into the pores and fuses in the kiln, forming a vitreous coating to the ware.

2. Sculp.: The unglazed material described under No. 1. (Used for making statuettes and ornaments, for which it is well adapted from its soft tone and from the absence of glaze upon its surface.)

B. As adjective:

A. As substantive:

I. Of persons:

1. New Testament:

* (1) A chief priest among the Jews.

"For he wiste that the hiyeste prestis hadden takun hym by envye. But the bischopis stirreden the people that he schulde rather leeue to hem Barabas . . ."—Wycliffe (ed. Purvey): Mark xv. 10, 11.

(2) An ecclesiastical functionary in the apostolical churches. There was a plurality of such officers in that at Philippi, their associates in government being deacons, while the "saints," or ordinary Christian members, are mentioned before both (Phil. i. 1). The same officers in the church at Miletus, termed in our version of the N. T. "overseers," are identical with the "elders" of the same ecclesiastical community. [See etymology.] "And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus and called the elders [πρεσβυτερους (presbuterous)] of the Church, and . . . said, . . . Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you [ἐπισκόπους (episkopous)] overseers." Or the word might have been rendered, as in other places, "bishops." The term πρεσβυτερος (presbuteros) was borrowed from the synagogue [ELDER, PRESBYTER]; etymologically it implied that, as a rule, the person so designated was pretty well advanced in life, whilst ἐπισκοπος (episkopos), borrowed from the polity of the Grecian States, pointed to the duty incumbent on him of overseeing the church. The qualifications of a New Testament bishop are given at length by St. Paul (1 Tim. iii. 1—7; Titus i. 7—9), the only other Christian functionary mentioned with him being still the deacon (1 Tim. iii. 8—13.)

2. Fig.: Christ viewed as the overseer or spiritual director of the souls of Christians, and as guiding them as a shepherd does his flock.

"For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the shepherd and bishop of your souls."—1 Pet. ii. 25.

II. Church History:

1. Post-apostolic period: A church functionary superior to, and ruling over, the elders or presbyters. Parity among a body of men may exist theoretically, but it cannot in practice be realised. At the deliberations held by the presbyters of Philippi, of Miletus, or other Christian churches, in all probability one of their number was voted into the chair. Times of persecution bring the strongest to the front, and that strong man would, at nearly every crisis, preside over his fellows. He would become their natural leader, and after a time their actual ruler. A distinctive appellation was required to discriminate him from his colleagues, and gradually he monopolised the term ἐπισκοπος (episkopos) = overseer or bishop, leaving the humbler designation of πρεσβυτερος (presbuteroi) = presbyters or elders, to his former equals. Such evangelists as Timothy and Titus also exercised functions in many respects identical with those of an episcopate (1 Tim. i. 3; iii. 1; v. 17, 19, 20, 22; 2 Tim. i. 6; ii. 2, 14; iv. 2, 5. Titus i. 5—13; ii. 15.) Finally, the pastor of a church which had a series of village churches to which it had given birth around it, would naturally become overseer of those in charge of these smaller congregations. All these influences tended in favour of episcopacy, which Dr. Lightfoot, late Bishop of Durham, believes to have arisen first in the Jewish Churches, whence betwe n 0 and 100 A.D. it spread to those of Gentile origin, while an inquirer of a totally different school of thought dates the change between 120 and 130. In the writings of Clement, one of the "Apostolic Fathers," the presbyter and bishop are still the same. Polycarp and Hermas speak less decidedly. Ignatius was once studde with passages extolling the episcopate. Most of these have since been discovered to be interpolations, and even the few that remain are not free from suspicion. Omitting various Christian fathers, and proceeding at once to the middle of the third century, the writings of Cyprian, who filled the see of Carthage from A.D. 248 to 258, are full of passages exalting the bishop high over the presbyter, the position claimed for the former being that of successor of the apostles. The views of

Cyprian became those of the church in general. [For further developments see ARCHBISHOP, CARDINAL, POPE.]

2. More modern times: A spiritual overseer ranking beneath an archbishop, and above the priests or presbyters and deacons of his diocese, but his jurisdiction is territorial, not personal. Before a bishop can be consecrated he must be thirty years of age. The Established Church of England is episcopal, and of its bishops twenty-four sit in the House of Lords. They are technically called "lords spiritual," but are not considered "peers of the realm;" they are only "lords of parliament," nor is their dignity hereditary. They rank in precedence below viscounts and above barons. Their style is the Right Rev the Lord Bishop of ——, and they are addressed as My Lord. In the United States the office of bishop exists in several church organizations, these being derived directly from the European Churches of the same name. These are the Roman Catholic, the Protestant Episcopal, and the Moravian or United Brethren, all of whom claim direct apostolic succession, and the Methodist Episcopal, which, while making no such claim, has a body of bishops as superintendents of the general clergy. The Reformed Episcopalians are a small body of seceders whose bishops have no dioceses or defined jurisdiction. The Church of Rome, the Greek Church, and the Eastern Churches generally, are under bishops. An immense majority of Christians throughout the world regard diocesan episcopacy as of divine institution; and many, attaching high importance to what is termed apostolic succession (q.v.), unchurch any Christian community which refuses to place itself under episcopal supervision, and deny that the orders of any minister are valid who has not been ordained by a bishop. [HISTORIC.]

"It is a fact now generally recognised by theologians of all shades of opinion that in the language of the New Testament the same officer in the church is called indifferently 'bishop,' ἐπίσκοπος (episkopos) and 'elder' or 'presbyter' (πρεσβύτερος)."—Lightfoot Bishops Prof. of Divinity, Trin. Col., Cambridge late Bishop of Durham (St Paul's Epis to the Philippians, 1868, p 95.

¶ Suffragan Bishop. [SUFFRAGAN.]

III. Of things:

1. A name for any of the small beetles popularly called Lady birds, and by entomologists placed in the genus Coccinella. [COCCINELLA, LADY-BIRD.]

2. A cant word for a mixture of wine, oranges and sugar.

"Fine oranges
Well roasted, with sugar and wine in a cup, They'll make a sweet bishop, when gentlefolks sup."
Swift.

3. A pad or cushion which used to be worn by ladies upon their waist behind; it was placed beneath the skirts, to which it was designed to give prominence; a bustle, a tournure.

4. One of the pieces in the game of chess. [CHESS.]

B. As adjective: Pertaining to the Christian functionary described under A.

bishop's bible. [See VERSION (1).]

bishop-leaves, bishop's leaves, s. [So called either because some bishop first pointed out the medical use of the plant so designated or because the highest flowers were thought to resemble an episcopal mitre.] A plant, the Water Figwort (Scrophularia aquatica).

bishop-weed, bishop's weed, s. A name given to two plants.

1. The Gout-weed (Ægopodium Podagraria, L.)

2. An umbelliferous plant (Ammi majus, L.) found wild on the continent of Europe, but not in Britain.

bishop's cap, s. The English name of a plant genus, Mitrella.

bishop's court, s.

Law: An ecclesiastical court held in the cathedral of each diocese, the bishop's chancellor acting as judge. If the diocese be large, commissaries act for him in its remoter parts for the settlement of such cases as may be delegated to them.

bishop's elder, s. A plant. Same as BISHOP-WEED (1) (q.v.).

bishop's foot, s. The foot of a bishop. (Lit. & fig.)

¶ The bishop's foot has been in the broth: The broth is singed. (Tyndale.) (Scotch.) Similarity in the north of England when milk is "burnt-to" in boiling it, the people say, "The bishop has set his foot in it." (Jamieson.) The exact origin of the phrase is doubtful.

bishop's leaves, s. [BISHOP-LEAVES.]

1. The office of an apostle; an apostolate.

"For it is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein: and his bishoprick let another take."—Acts i. 20.

¶ The word in Gr. is ἐπισκοπὴν (episkopēn). The quotation is from Psalm cix. 8, where in the Septuagint exactly the same Greek word is used, correctly rendered in our version of the Psalms "office."

2. The diocese or see of a bishop, the territory over which the jurisdiction of a bishop extends. Many of the English bishoprics date back to Anglo-Saxon times. Besides the two Archbishoprics of Canterbury and York, the following thirteen English sees were in existence prior to the Norman Conquest: London, Winchester, Chichester, Rochester, Salisbury, Bath and Wells, Exeter, Worcester, Hereford, Coventry and Lichfield, Lincoln, Norwich and Durham. So were the Bishopric of Man (combined with that of Sodor, from Sudoreys = the Southern Isles, the Scand. name for the Hebrides, about 1113) and the Welsh sees of St. Davids (once an archbishopric), Bangor, St. Asaph, and Llandaff. Since then the following English sees have been created: Ely (A.D.1109), Carlisle (1133), Oxford (1541), Peterborough (1541), Gloucester (1541), Bristol (1541) (the two last since united), Chester (1541), Ripon (1836), Manchester (1848), St. Albans and Truro (1877), and Liverpool (1880). Of all the English sees London, Durham, and Winchester are held to rank highest, and their occupants have always seats in the House of Lords. The Bishop of Sodor and Man, the lowest in point of dignity, never has this privilege; nor do the four bishops who are junior in point of standing possess it, only twenty-four bishops being entitled to sit at one time in the Upper House, and there being in England twenty-nine sees. In the Church of Ireland, besides two archbishoprics, there are ten bishoprics. In the Scottish Episcopal Church there are seven. Connected with the Church of England in the colonies, including India, there are sixty sees, besides at least eight in foreign parts. Within the British Islands, the Roman Catholic Church counts thirteen bishoprics in England, four in Scotland, and twenty-four in Ireland. In the United States there are sixty-eight bishops of the Protestant Episcopal and twenty-eight of the Methodist Episcopal Churches. The Roman Catholic Church has a cardinal, thirteen archbishops and seventy-three bishops.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between bishopric and diocese:—"Both these words denote the extent of an episcopal jurisdiction: the first with relation to the person who officiates the second with relation to the charge. There may, therefore, be a bishopric, either where there are many dioceses or no diocese; but according to the import of the term, there is properly no diocese where there is not a bishopric. When the jurisdiction is merely titular, as in countries where the catholic religion is not recognised, it is a bishopric, but not a diocese. On the other hand, the bishopric of Rome or that of an archbishop, comprehends all the dioceses of the subordinate bishops." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) bish-ŏpe-wŏrt, s. [Eng. bishop's; wort.] The name of two plants.

1. The Betony (Stachys Betonica, Benthan)

2. A ranunculaceous plant, Nigella damascena, perhaps because the carpels look like a mitre. (Britten and Holland.) bis-mūth, s. [In Dan., Fr., & Port. bismuth; Sw. & Ital. bismutte; Mod. Lat. bismuthum, stannum; Ger. wismuth. Ultimate etym. unknown.]

1. Chem.: A trad metallic element, rarely pentad At.Wt.210.8; symb. $Bi^{'''}$. Bismuth occurs native along with quartz, and is separated by fusion; it is dissolved in nitric acid, and a large quantity of water added, which precipitates basic bismuth nitrate; this is fused with pure charcoal, which reduces it to the metallic state. Bismuth is a crystalline, hard, brittle, diamagnetic, reddish-white metal, sp. gr. 9·9, melts at 264 C., and expanding on solidifying. It is permanent in the air, but oxidises into $Bi^{'''}_2O_3$, at red-heat burning with a blue flame. Powdered bismuth takes fire in chlorine gas forming $BiCl_3$. Bismuth is easily dissolved by nitric acid; hydrochloric acid has little action on it. Boiling sulphuric acid oxidises it with liberation of SO_2. Bismuth is used to make fusible metal, an alloy of two parts bismuth, one of lead, and one of tin; it melts at 96 C. Bismuth forms a dioxide Bi_2O_4, a trioxide $Bi^{'''}_2O_3$, and a pentoxide Bi_2O_5. The so-called tetroxide Bi_2O_4 is said to be a compound of the last two oxides. Bismuth forms one chloride $Bi^{'''}Cl_3$ bismuthous chloride (q.v.). Bismuth salts are precipitated by H_2S from an acid solution (see Analysis). They may be separated from the other metals of that group thus: the precipitate of sulphides is boiled and then treated with $(NH_4)HS$ ammonium sulphide, which dissolves the sulphides of arsenic, antimony and tin; the residue is washed, and then boiled with nitric acid, which dissolves all the sulphides except mercuric sulphide HgS. The solution is then evaporated with sulphuric acid, the lead, if any, separates out as $PbSO_4$, then an excess of NH_3H_2O is added in excess, which precipitates the bismuth as $Bi^{'''}(OH)_3$, the copper and cadmium are in the solution. The salts of bismuth give a white precipitate with water if $NH^{'''}Cl$ ammonia chloride is first added to prevent them into bismuth chloride, and they give a yellow precipitate with K_2CrO_4, which is insoluble in KHO, but soluble in nitric acid. They are reduced on charcoal by the blowpipe-flame, yielding a brittle metallic bead, and give a slight yellow incrustation of oxide.

2. Min. Bismuth, Native Bismuth: A sectile and brittle mineral occurring in hexagonal crystals, or reticulated, arborescent, foliated, or granular. The hardness is 2·25; the sp. gr., 9·727; the lustre metallic, the streak and colour of a specimen silvery-white with a reddish tinge. Composition, bismuth 99·914, with traces of tellurium and iron. It occurs, with other metals, in veins in gneiss, clay-slate, and other metamorphic rocks. It has been found in several counties of England, in the silver and cobalt mines of Saxony, in Bohemia, in Norway, Sweden, and in Virginia, North and South Carolina, California, and several other of our Western States.

3. Pharm.: Subnitrate of Bismuth, Carbonate of Bismuth, and Oxide of Bismuth taken internally act as sedatives on the stomach in dyspepsia and chronic vomiting. They have been also used in epilepsy and in the diarrhœa attending phthisis. Preparations of bismuth are sometimes employed externally as cosmetics, but when a sulphuretted gas acts upon them they blacken the face.

¶ Acicular Bismuth is = Aikinite; Carbonate of Bismuth = Bismuth Carbonate; Cupreous Bismuth = (a) Aikinite, (b) Wittichenite; Oxide of Bismuth = Bismite; Silicate of Bismuth = Eulytite; Sulphuret of Bismuth = Bismuthinite; Telluric Bismuth = Tetradymite.

Min.: Bismuthaurite.

Chem.: Bismuthic Oxide, called also Bismuthic Anhydride, Bismuth Pentoxide Bi_2O_5. It is prepared by passing chlorine through a solution of potash holding $Bi^{'''}_2O_3$ in suspension; the red precipitate is digested with strong nitric acid to remove any Bi_2O_4. The bright red powder is bismuthic acid $HBiO_3$; this when heated to 120 C is converted into Bi_2O_5, which is a dull red powder; when strongly heated it gives off oxygen, and forms bismuth tetroxide or bismuthous bismuthite $Bi_2O_3BiO_2$.

bis'-mūth id, s. [Eng. &c. bismuth, and suff. -id.] A mineral having bismuth as one of its leading elements. (Dana, 3rd. ed., p 26.)

bis-mūth-ine, s. [Eng. bismuth; -ine.]

Min.: Bismuthinite (q.v.).

bis-mūth-in-ite, s. [Eng. bismuthin(e); -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: An opaque orthorhombic mineral, in acicular crystals or massive foliated or fibrous. The hardness is 2; the sp. gr., 6·4 -7·2; the lustre metallic, with a lead-grey streak and colour. Composition: sulphur, 18·19—19·61; bismuth, 74·35—80·99 or more. It occurs in Cornwall and elsewhere. It is called also Bismuthine, Bismuthoplagionite, Bismuth-glance, and Sulphuret of Bismuth.

bis-mūth-ō-lamp-rite, s. [From Eng., &c. bismuth; Gr. λαμπρὸς (lampros) = bright, brilliant, radiant; Eng. suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.)] A mineral, called also Bismuthinite and Bismuthite (q.v.).

bis-mūth-ous, a. [Eng. bismuth, and suff. -ous.] Belonging to bismuth.

Bismuthous chloride.

Chem.: $Bi^{'''}Cl_3$, also called Trichloride of Bismuth. It is obtained by heating bismuth in chlorine gas, or by distilling the metal with twice its weight of mercuric chloride ($HgCl_2$). It is a white hygroscopic substance, melting at 230° and distilling at a higher temperature. It is soluble in dilute HCl, and by the addition of water becomes turbid, $Bi^{'''}OCl$, a white powder being formed, which is used as a pigment called "pearl white."

Bismuthous nitrate.

Chem.: $Bi^{'''}(NO_3)_3.5H_2O$. It is obtained by dissolving the metal in nitric acid. It crystallises in large transparent prisms. By pouring a solution of this salt into a large quantity of water a white basic nitrate is precipitated. This is used in medicine under the name of Bismuthi subnitras; it acts as a direct sedative on the mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines. It is given in irritant forms of dyspepsia and chronic vomiting, also to check diarrhœa. It is also largely used as a cosmetic, but it is blackened by sulphuretted hydrogen.

Bismuthous oxide.

Chem.: Bi_2O_3, also called Bismuth Trioxide. Obtained by heating the basic nitrate of bismuth to low redness. It is a yellow insoluble powder. The white hydrate is obtained by precipitating a salt of bismuth by an excess of ammonia.

bis'-mūt ite, bis-mūth-ite, s. [In Ger. bismutit; from tier., Eng., &c., bismuth, and -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: An opaque or subtranslucent mineral, occurring in minute acicular crystals or incrusting, or amorphous. The hardness varies from 1·5 in earthy specimens to 4· or 4·5 in those which are more compact; sp. gr. 6·9 to 7·7; lustre vitreous to dull. It varies in hue, being white, green, yellow, and yellowish-grey. Composition: Carbonic acid, 6·56 to 7·30; oxide of bismuth, 87·67 to ·80; water, 3·44 to 5·03. It occurs on the continent of Europe and in America.

I. Ord. Lang.: The name given to two species of ruminating animals belonging to the Ox family.

1. The European Bison (Bison Europæus).

2. Wrongly applied to the Aurochs (Bos primigenius).

"Neither had the Greeks any experience of these great or buffalo, called in or bisontes."—Holland. Pliny, pt. ii., p. 96.

¶ It will be observed that the word bison at first brought with it into the English language its Lat. pl. Bisontes. On becoming naturalised, however, it exchanged this for bisons. [See the example under I., 1.]

3. An analogous species roaming over a great part of North America. [II. 2.]

"Worn with the ' g day's march and the chase of the deer and bison."

Longfellow Hiawatha, xi. 4

II. Zool. & Palæont.: A genus of ruminants belonging to the family Bovidæ (Oxen). They have proportionately a larger head than oxen with a conical hump between the shoulders, due to excessive development of the spinal processes of the dorsal vertebræ, and a shaggy mane. Two species are known.

1. Bison Europæus, sometimes called Bonasus Bison, the European Bison. It is the βόνασος (Bonasos) or βόνασος (Bonasus) of Aristotle, the Βόνασ (Bonâs) of Oppian, the Bison jubatus, and the Bonasus of Pliny, and the L. bison of Linnæus. It is often wrongly called the Aurochs, which is etymologically the same word as Cæsar's Urus [Aurochs]. This animal has been known from classic times, and Pliny contrasts it with the Aurochs, as does Martial, who tells us that these beasts were trained to draw chariots in the Roman amphitheatre. It was formerly abundant over Mid and Eastern Europe, and is the largest living European quadruped, standing some six feet high at the shoulder, and measuring about ten feet from the muzzle to the root of the tail, which is nearly three feet more, and the strength is proportional to the size. The general colour is dusky brown; there is a thick mane, and the hair on the forehead is long and wavy. The cows are smaller than the bulls, and the mane is thinner. The European Bison is now restricted to some part of the Caucasus, and to Lithuania, where it is strictly protected by the Czar of Russia. Some specimens have been exhibited in the gardens of the Zoological Society.

2. Bison Americanus or Bonasus Americanus, the American Bison, popularly but erroneously called the Buffalo. It has fifteen ribs on each side, whilst the European bison has but fourteen, and the domestic ox thirteen. They once roamed in herds in the western part of British America and in the United States. They are large and powerful animals, with great humped shoulders and a shaggy mane. Their horns are short and taper rapidly. They can resist a moderate number of wolves, but fall a prey to the grizzly bear. They have been so relentlessly pursued by reckless hunters that they are almost exterminated, though they formerly existed in vast multitudes. At present there are only one or two small herds left, but an effort is being made to preserve and increase them in Yellowstone National Park.

I.).]

A. As adjective: Containing two sixth days in the kalends of the same month; containing an intercalary day in whatever way numbered; pertaining to leap year. [B.]

"Towards the latter end of February is the bissextile or intercalary day, called bissextile, because the sixth of the calends of March is twice repeated."—Holder on Time

B. As substantive:

1. Roman Year: An intercalary day introduced into the Roman month of February once in four years. The name bissextile = twice a sixth, was given because during leap year two days of February in succession were each called Sexta (dies) Kalendas Martii or Martias = the sixth of the kalends of March. These two days corresponded to the 24th and 25th of February in our reckoning. [Calendar, Leap Year.]

"The year of the sun consisteth of three hundred and sixty five days and six hours, wanting eleven minutes which six hours omitted, will, in time, deprave the compute: and this was the occasion of bissextile, or leap year."—Browne

2. Our own Year: The term bissextile is still retained for leap year, though there is no reckoning of two sixth days anywhere in it. When it occurs, twenty-nine days are assigned to February instead of the twenty-eight, a much more natural method of reckoning than that originated by the Romans.

"Bissextile, Leap Year, which happens every fourth year. . . ."—Glossog. Nov.

bis'-tort, s. [In Fr. bistorte, from Lat. bis = twice, and tortus = twisted, so named from the twisted roots.]

Bot.: The English name given to a subgenus or sub-division of the genus Polygonum. Two British species fall under it, the P. bistorta (Common Bistort or Snakeweed), and the P. viviparum, or Viviparous Alpine Bistort. Each has a small stem with a single terminal raceme of flowers. The former has flesh-coloured flowers and is common; the latter has pale flowers and is an alpine plant. It is sometimes called Alpine Bistort.

¶ Dock Bistort: Polygonum Bistorta.

bis tour-ȳ, bis-tour ī, s. [Low Lat. bistoria; Fr. bistouri; from Pistoi, ancient city and Pistoria, a city in Italy, twenty miles north-west of Florence, where these knives are made at an early period.] A surgical instrument used for making incisions. It has various forms—one like a lancet, a second like the straight bistoury, with the blade set at and fixed on a handle; and a third, the crooked bistoury, shaped like a half moon with the cutting edge on the inside.

bi-sul-phide, s. [From Lat. prefix bi, and Eng. sulphide (q.v.).] A chemical compound formed by the union of two atoms of sulphur with another element.

Chem.: Carbon disulphide, CS_2. It is prepared by passing the vapour of sulphur over red hot charcoal. Carbon disulphide is a transparent, colourless, inflammable, stinking liquid; sp. gr. 1·272; it boils at 46° C. It has great refractive and dispersive power; it burns with a blue flame, forming CO_2 and SO_2. It is insoluble in water, but it dissolves sulphur, gums, caoutchouc, phosphorus and iodine, and alkaloids. Its vapour is very poisonous, and is very explosive when mixed with the air or with oxygen gas. Carbon disulphide unites with metallic sulphides, forming salts called Sulphocarbonates having the composition of carbonates with the oxygen replaced by sulphur, as calcium-sulphocarbonate $CaCS_3$. A mixture of the vapour of CS_2 and H_2S passed over copper heated to redness yields a copper sulphide Cu_2S and marsh gas CH_4. Carbon disulphide is used to kill insects, but no light must be near as its vapour is explosive.

Bisulphide of Carbon Engine: A compound engine in which the vapour from bisulphide of carbon is employed in the second cylinder instead of steam as a motive-power. A binary engine.

(3) Food. (Scotch.) (Vulgar.)

* The bit and the beat: Food and raiment. [BEAT.] (Scotch.) (Proverb. Allusions.)

2. Figuratively:

(1) Gen.: A fragment; a small portion. Used—

(a) Of a magnitude, or material body.

"His majesty has power to grant a patent for stamping round bits of copper, to every subject he hath." — Swift.

(b) A short space of time. (Scotch.)

"O an he would but hasten off the smugglers a bit" [i.e., for a bit, for a little]. — Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xl.

(2) Scotch: A piece of ground, a place, or particular spot.

"Weel, just as I was coming up the loo, I saw a man above me that I kent was nane o' our hership, and it's a wild bit to meet any other body." — Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xl.

(3) It is sometimes used of anything not actually very small, but described as being so by one who is proud of it or who likes it.

"There was never a prettier bit o' horseflesh in the stable o' the Jovial Archer, said the man." — Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xl.

3. Numis. & Ord. Lang.:

(a) The popular English name for a small Spanish coin, a half pistareen circulating in the West Indies. Its value is now about 5d. sterling. In Johnson's time it was estimated at 7½d.

(b) A silver coin circulating in the Southern States of America, in value an eighth of a dollar = 9d.

4. Metal-working, Carpentry, &c.:

(a) A boring-tool used by wood-workers. It is attached to a brace, by which it is rotated. An auger has many points of resemblance to a bit, but has a cross-handle whereby it is rotated, whereas a bit is stocked in the socket of a brace, and is rotated thereby. It runs into many varieties of form, such as the centre bit, the sperm bit, the gimlet bit, &c. [For these see the word preceding bit in the several compounds.] (Knight.)

(b) The cutting-iron of a plane. [PLANE BIT.]

(c) The cutting-iron inserted in the revolving head of a machine for planing, grooving, &c.

(d) The cutting blade of an axe, hatchet, or any similar tool. It is distinguished from the pole, which forms a hammer in some tools.

5. Metal-working:

(a) A boring-tool for metal. There are various kinds of it, such as the half-round bit, the rose bit, the cylinder bit, &c.

(b) The copper piece of a soldering-tool riveted to an iron shank: a copper bit.

¶ See also 1, 2, and 3, under II. of BIT (2).

B. As an adjective: Diminutive.

(a) Without contempt:

"I heard ye were here, frae the bit errant ye sent to meet your carriage." — Scott: Antiquary, ch. vii.

(b) Contemptuously:

"Some of you will grieve and greet [cry] for the drowning of a bit calf or stirk, than ever ye did for all the tyranny and oppressions of Scotland." — Walker Peden, p. 62. (Jamieson.)

C. As adverb: A bit: In the least; in the smallest degree.

bit-holder, s. That which holds a boring-bit.

bit-stock, s. The handle by which a bit is held and rotated. It is called also a brace.

bit (2),  bitte (2),  bytt (2), s. [A.S. bite, byrte = a bit of a bridle; a bridle, trappings, harness (Bosworth); bitol = a bridle. Sw. betsel = a bridle: Dan. betsel = a bit, a curb: Dut. gebit . . . = a bit.] [BIT, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Chiefly in the sense II. 1.

"Behold we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us: and we turn about their whole body." — James iii. 3.

2. Fig.: A curb; a restraint of any kind.

II. Technically:

1. Iron-working, Saddlery, &c.: The iron part of a bridle which is inserted in the mouth of a horse, and having rings by which the cheek-straps and reins are attached. [See BRIDLE-BIT.]

CORNET BIT.

* Obvious compound, bit-maker. (Ogilvie.) bit-key, s. A key adapted for the permutation lock, the steps being formed by movable bits, as in the Hobbs lock.

bit-pincers, s. pl.

Locksmithing: Pincers having curved or recessed jaws.

bit (1), v.t. [A.S. bítan = to bridle, rein in, curb, bit.] To put the bit in the mouth of a horse; to bridle a horse. (Johnson.)

bi tär-tar-ate, s. [Lat. prefix bi = two, and Eng. tartarate (q.v.).]

Chem.: A name given to salts, as $KHC_4H_4O_6$, acid tartarate of potassium, or hydric-potassic tartarate. This salt is also called Cream of Tartar. It is prepared from argol or tartar, an impure acid potassium tartarate, which is deposited from grape-juice during the process of fermentation: the colouring matter is removed by animal charcoal, and then it is purified by crystallisation. It forms groups of small, translucent, oblique, rhombic crystals, which are slightly soluble in cold water, but insoluble in spirit. When heated in a close vessel it is decomposed, leaving a residue of charcoal and pure potassium carbonate. It is frequently used in medicine in small doses as a refrigerant and diuretic; and in large doses, mixed with jalap, as a powerful hydragogue purgative.

 bi-taughte, pret. [A.S. bitaúhte, bitaughte, pret. of bitæcan = deliver to, commend.] Commended. [BETAKE.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To infix the teeth in anything, either for the purpose of detaching a portion of it and swallowing it for food, to inflict a wound, or for other purposes; to break or crush with the teeth.

"My very enemy's dog,
Though he had bit me, should have stood that night Against my fire."
Shakesp.: Lear, iv. 7.

II. Figuratively:

1. Of persons:

(1) To inflict sharp pain on the body. Spec.,—

(a) To cut, to wound. Chiefly in participial adjective biting, as biting falchion. [BITING.]

(b) To inflict such torture as intense cold does.

"Here feel we . . . the icy phang
And churlish chiding of the winter's wind,
Which when it bites and blows upon my body,
Even till I shrink with cold, I smile."
Shakesp.: As You Like It, II. 1.

(c) To make the mouth smart by applying an acrid substance to it. (Chiefly in the pr. pa.)

"It may be, the first water will have more of the scent, as more fragrant, and the second more of the taste, as more bitter, or biting."—Bacon.

(2) To inflict sharp pain upon the mind.

(a) To engage in angry contention with; sharply to reproach; to use language fitted to wound.

"But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed of one another."—Gal. v. 15.

(b) To trick, to cheat. (Vulgar.)

"Asleep and naked as an Indian lay,
An honest factor stole a gem away:
He pledg'd it to the knight; the knight had wit,
So kept the diamond, and the rogue was bit."
Pope: Mor. Essays, Ep. iii. 364

2. Of things: To take hold of the ground or other surface firmly, as a skate upon ice. [C. Bite in.]

B. Intrans.: Formed by dropping the objective of the verb transitive to which it corresponds in meaning.

"Let dogs delight To bark and bite."
Watts: Hymns.

C. In special phrases. (In these bite is generally transitive.)

1. To bite in: To corrode copper or steel plates as nitric acid does in the process of etching.

2. To bite the ear: To do so after a fashion without hurting it; this was intended as an expression of endearment.

"Slave, I could bite thine ear.
Away, thou dost not care for me."
Ben Jonson: Alch., II. 3.

¶ Sometimes bite is used alone in a similar sense.

"Rare rogue in buckram, let me bite thee."
Goblins, O. Pl., ii. 147. (Nares.)

3. To bite the thumb at; to bite the nail of the thumb at: To show contempt for, this being one of the methods formerly adopted of indicating contempt. Nares says that the thumb in such a case represented a fig, and the action of biting it was tantamount to saying, "A fig for you," or, "The fico!" He cites in proof the following lines:

"Behold next I see Contempt marching forth giving me the fico, with his thombe in his mouth."
Lodge Wit's Miserie, 1596.

"I will bite my thumb at them; which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it."—Shakesp.: Rom. & Jul., I. 1.

"'Tis no less disrespectful to bite the nail of your thumb, by way of scorn and disdain, and drawing your nail from between your teeth, to tell them you value not this what they can do."—Rules of Civility (transl. from French), p. 44.

* 4. To bite upon the bridle: To become a servant to others (?).

"The labouring hand grows rich, but who are idle
In winter time must bite upon the bridle."
Poor Robin, 1746. (Halliwell: Contr. to Lexicog.)

Story of Gen. & Exod., 3,931-6.

(b) Of natural calamities: Affectively, calamitously.

"... my mind misgives,
Some consequence, yet hanging, in the stars,
Shall bitterly begin his fearful date
With this night's revels."
Shakesp.: Rom. & Jul., i. 4.

3. So as to stir the mind up to anger.

"Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly."—Hos. xii. 14.

II. Subjectively:

1. With angry or other feelings manifested, or at least entertained.

"Ghe gol him bitterlike a-gen."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 2,030.

"William had complained bitterly to the Spanish Government ..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

2. With deep sorrow; sorrowfully.

"And he [Peter] went out and wept bitterly."—Matt. xxvi. 75.

bit'-tərn (1), s. [From Eng. bitter, this taste being due to magnesium salts.]

1. Comm.: A name given to the mother liquid obtained when sea-water is evaporated to extract the salt (NaCl). Bittern contains sulphates of magnesium, potassium, and sodium, also bromides. It is used as a source of bromine. Under the name of Oil of Salt, it is sometimes used to rub parts of the body affected with rheumatism.

* 2. An old trade name for a mixture of quassia, cocculus indicus, &c., used many years ago by fraudulent brewers to give an appearance of strength to their beer. [BITTERING.]

bit'-tərn (2), * bit-tor, * bit-tour, * bit-ore, s. [In Fr. butor; Dut. butoor; Lat. butio; Low. Lat. butor, butorius; Mod. Lat. botaurus, contr. from bostaurus, i.e. bos taurus = the bull; Class. Lat. taurus = a bull, bullock, or steer, ... a small bird that imitates the lowing of oxen, perhaps the bittern.]

1. Ornith. & Ord. Lang.: The English name for the birds of the genus Botaurus [BOTAURUS], and especially for the common one, Botaurus stellaris. The Bitterns are distinguished from the Herons proper, besides other characteristics, by having the feathers of the neck loose and divided, which makes it appear thicker than in reality it is. They are usually spotted or striped. Three species occur in Europe—the Botaurus stellaris, or Common Bittern; the B. minutus, or Little Bittern; and the B. lentiginosus, or American Bittern. The first-named species is locally named the "Mire-drum," the "Bull of the Bog," &c., in allusion to its bellowing or drumming noise about February or March during the breeding season. It is about two and a half feet long. The general colour of its plumage is dull pale-yellow, variegated with spots and bars of black. The feathers of the head are black, shot with green; the bill and the legs are pale-green; the middle claw is serrated on the inner edge. It is nocturnal. It frequents wooded swamps and reedy marshes, but is rare in Britain; it is only a summer visitant. The American Bittern is a common inhabitant of many parts of the United States. The crown of the head is reddish brown, and the plumage differs considerably from the Common Bittern. The Least Bittern (B. exilis) is another American species, of very small size and somewhat social habits.

"That a bittor maketh that mugient noyse, or, as we term it, bumping, by putting his bill into a reed as most believe, or as Bellonius and Androvandus conceive, by putting the same in water or mud, and after a while retaining the ayr by suddenly excluding it again, is not so easily made out."—Browne: Vulgar Errours, iii. 27.

"Alike when first the vales the bittern fills."
Wordsworth: The Evening Walk.

2. The Bittern of Scripture: קִפּוֹד (Qiputh) has not been certainly identified. The Septuagint renders it ἐχῖνος (echinos) = a hedgehog, an opinion with which Gesenius agrees. But the Scriptural animal seems to have been a bird frequenting pools of water and possessed of a voice, and the rendering of the authorised version bittern may be, and probably is, correct.

"But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it: the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it: ..."—Isa. xxxiv. 11.

"... both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; their voices shall sing in the windows, ..."—Zephan. ii. 14.

bit'-tər-nĕss, * bit-tər-nēsse, * byt'-tər-nēss, * byt-ər-nēsse, * byt-tyr-nēsse, s. [Eng. bitter; -ness.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Objectively: The act or quality of imparting the sensation that something is bitter in the literal or figurative sense of the term.

1. The quality of being bitter to the taste, or sharp or acrid to the surface of the body.

"... which [leaves of the endive] being blanched to diminish their bitterness ..."—Treas. of Bot., i. 283.

2. The act or quality of being fitted to hurt the feelings.

"shall the sword devour for ever? knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end?"—2 Sam. ii. 26.

"... having drunk to the dregs all the bitterness of servitude, ..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

3. The act or quality of being fitted to produce needless contention, or sin and scandal of any other kind.

"... lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled."—Heb. xii. 15.

II. The state of feeling bitter.

1. The state of feeling irritated or angry, with the effect of showing such irritation by looks or words; or the state of being habitually in a bad temper; acrimony, harshness or severity of temper.

(a) Temporarily.

"'And must she rule?'
Thus was the dying woman heard to say
In bitterness, 'and must she rule and reign,
Sole mistress of this house, when I am gone?'" Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

(b) Habitually.

"Save that distemper'd passions lent their force
In bitterness that banish'd all remorse."
Byron: Lara, ii. 10.

2. The state of being sorrowful; sorrow, grief, vexation of spirit arising from outward calamity, unkind treatment, or internal remorse.

"... her virgins are afflicted, and she is in bitterness."—Lam. i. 4.

3. The state of being under the influence of sin, as repulsive to the moral sense as gall is to the taste.

"For I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity."—Acts viii. 23.

B. Mental Phil.: The quality of bitterness is really a mental feeling produced by certain objects, but not inherent in those objects themselves.

"The idea of whiteness, or bitterness, is, in the mind, exactly answering that power which is in any body to produce it there."—Locke.

bit'-tərn, s. pl. [BITTER, B., II. 2.]

bit'-tərn-gâll, s. [Eng. bitter; as; gall.] The fruit of the Crab, Pyrus malus, L.

"It is often said of a soft, silly person, 'He was born where the bittergalls da grow, and one o'm hall'd on his head and made a zaate (soft) place there."—Pulman (Bruton & Holland.)

bit'-tər-swēet, * bit-ter swēte, * bit'-tər-swēet-ing, a. & s. [Eng. bitter; sweet; -ing.]

A. As adjective: In rapid succession bitter and sweet.

"Do but remember these cross capers then, you bitter sweet one Till then adieu you bitter-sweet one."
Match at Midn., O Pl., vii. 373. (Nares.)

¶ If there is an allusion to the fruit described under B. 1, then B. should precede A.

B. As substantive:

I. Literally:

* 1. (Of the forms bittersweet and bitter sweeting): A kind of apple.

¶ This is the only sense of the word given in Johnson's Dict.

"And left me such a bitter-sweet to gnaw upon?"
Fair Em., 1631. (Nares.)

"Thy wit is a very bitter sweeting; it is a most sharp sauce."—Shakesp.: Rom. & Jul., ii. 4.

2. (Of the forms bittersweet and * bitter sweet): Apparently coined by Turner as a translation of the Lat. Amara dulcis, or, as it is now written, Dulcamara. The reason of the name is when the fruit is first tasted it is bitter, and afterwards sweet, there being an "after-taste." [AFTER-TASTE.]

(a) A name for the Woody Nightshade, Solanum Dulcamara. It is of the same genus as the potato. It has large yellow anthers collectively resembling a cone, purple flowers with green tubercles at the base of each segment, and a shrubby, flexuose, thornless stem with cordate leaves, the upper ones nearly hastate. The inflorescence consists of drooping corymbs inserted opposite to the leaves. The berries are red, and are used by the common people for medicinal purposes. The plant grows wild in Britain.

(b) A name given in America to the Celastrus scandens, a plant of the order Celastraceæ (Spindle-trees).

II. Figuratively: Anything which is in succession bitter and sweet, or sweet and then bitter.

"It is but a bitter-sweet at best, and the fine colours of the serpent do by no means make amends for the smart and poison of his sting."—South.

bit'-tər-wôrt, * by-ter-wort, s. [Eng. bitter, and suff. -wort.]

1. Various species of Gentians, specially Gentiana amarella, G. campestris, G. lutea, and G. cruciata. (Gerard, Prior, &c.)

2. The Dandelion (Leontodon taraxacum). (Cockayne: Gloss.)

* bit'-till, s. [BITTLE, s. (q.v.).] (Scotch.) bit'-ting, pr. par. [BITT, BIT, v.] bitting-rigging, s.

Saddlery: A bridle, surcingle, back-strap, and crupper. The bridge has a gag rein and side-reins, the latter buckling to the surcingle. The rigging is placed on young horses to give them a good carriage, but must be released occasionally, as the bent position of the neck and elevation of the head is unnatural, and takes time to acquire. (Knight.) bit'-tle (tle as tl), bit'-til, s. [Eng. beetle (1) (q.v.).] A heavy wooden club or mallet, especially one for beating clothes when at the wash. (Scotch.)

"Mak a gray gus a gold garland
A lang spere of a mu till for a bettle bald Nobles of nutc-hellis, and silver wand."
Houlate, iii. 12, MS. (Jamieson.) bit'-tle (tle as tl), v.t. [From bittle, s. (q.v.). See also BEETLE (1), v.] To beat clothes with a flat-club in lieu of smoothing them by machinery. (Scotch.)

"... the sheets made good the country-woman's vaunt of the hostess, 'that they would be as pleasant to lie on as could find out; gate, for they were washed with the fairy-well water, and bleached on the ... white gowans, and bittled by Nelly and herself."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xxiv.

bit'-tled, pa. par. [BITTLE.]

bit'-tling, pr. par. [BITTLE.]

bit'-tŏck, s. [Eng. bit, and dim. suffix -ock. A diminutive of bit.] A small bit.

¶ A mile and a bittock: A mile and some what more.

"The three miles diminished into like a mile and a bittock."—Guy Mannering, ch. i. 4.

* bit'-tor, * bit'-tour, s. [BITTERN.] (Dryden, &c.)

bitts, s. [BITT.]

* bit tŭr, s. [BITTERN.]

bi-tu-bèr'-cu-late, a. [Pref. bi, and tuberculate.] Having two tubercles.

"The medial region minutely bi tuberculate."—Dana: Crustacea, p. 130.

+ bi-tū'me, s. [BITUMEN.]

bi-tū'med, a. [From Eng. &c., bitum(e); -ed.] Impregnated with bitumen.

"2 Brid. Sir, we have a chest beneath the hatches, caulked and bitumed ready."—Shakesp.: Pericles, iii. 1.

bi-tū'-mēn, bit'-ū-mēn, † bi-tū'me, *bȳ-tū'-mĕn, s. [In Fr. & Ital. bitume; Sp. betun; Prov. bitum; Port. betume, betume; Lat. bitumen; from the root bit, perhaps the same as pit; in Gr. πίσσα (pissa), or ἄσφαλτος (pitta), meaning pitch (Pitch). Suffix -umen probably means stuff, as alb-umen = white stuff. Hence bitumen would mean pitch stuff. Its ordinary name in Greek, however, is not a word derived from πίσσα (pissa), but is ἄσφαλτος (asphaltos). This Liddell & Scott consider a word of foreign origin introduced into the Greek.]

A. Ord. Lang.: In the mineralogical sense. [B.]

1. Of the form bitume. (Poetic.) (See etym. Fr., Ital., & Port.)

"Mix with these
Idæan pitch, quick sulphur, silver's spume, Sea onion, hellebore, and black bitume." May.

2. Of all the forms given above. (Prose & Poetry.)

"The fabrick seem'd a work of rising ground, With sulphur and bitumen cast between."
Dryden.

B. Technically:

I. Min.: The same as Asphalt or Asphaltum (q.v.).

"Bitumen: Mineral pitch, of which the tar-like substance which is often seen to ooze out of the Newcastle coal when on fire, and which makes it cake, is a good example."—Lyell: Princip. of Geol., Gloss.

* Elastic Bitumen: A mineral, the same as Elaterite (q.v.). Some varieties may have arisen from the action of subterranean heat upon coal or lignite.

II. Geol. (For the geological origin of bitumen see Asphalt, A., II. 2. Geol.)

bi-tū-min-ąte, v.t. [From Lat. bituminatus (a.) = impregnated with latumen. In Fr. bitumiser; Sp. betunar, embetunar; Port. betumar.] [Bitumen.] To impregnate with bitumen.

bi-tū'-min-ā-tĕd, pa. par. & a. [From Lat. bituminatus.] [Bituminate.]

"... the bituminated walls of Babylon."—Fotheam, pt. 1, Resolve 46. (Richardson.) bi-tū-min-i'-fêr-oŭs, a. [Lat. bitumen, and fero = to bear.] Bearing bitumen. (Kirwan.) bi-tū-min-iz-ā'-tion, s. [Eng. bituminiz(e), and suff. -ation.] The art or process of converting into bitumen, or at least of impregnating with it; the state of being so changed or impregnated. (Mantell.) bi-tū'-min ize, v.t. [Lat. bitumen, and Eng. suff. -ize; from Gr. suff. -ίζω (izō) = to make.] To impregnate with or convert into bitumen. (Lat. Magaz. &c. Webster.) bi tūm-in-i zed, pa. par. & a. [Bituminize, v.t.] bi tūm-in-i-zing, pr. par & a. [Bituminize, v.t.]

bi-tū'-min oŭs, a. [In Fr. bitumineux (m.), bitumineuse (f.); Ger. bituminös; Port betuminoso; Sp. and Ital. bituminoso; from Lat. bitumen = abounding in bitumen (there is bitumen = consisting of bitumen).] [Bitumen.] Consisting in whole or in part of bitumen; having the qualities of bitumen; combined with, impregnated with, or in any other way containing to bitumen.

"Mariners from Eden towards the west, shall find Their passage worse, as black bituminous surge Boils out from under ground, the mouth of hell."
Milton: P. L., bk. xii bituminous cement. A cement made from natural asphalt. [Asphalt (Art and Comm.).] It is sometimes called also bituminous mastic. The pure kind of it consists simply of mineral asphalt; the impure one has carbonate of lime in its composition, which prevents it from melting, as the pure variety does when the sun's rays are powerful.

bituminous coals.

Min.: Coals which burn with a yellow, smoky flame, and on distillation give out hydrocarbon or tar. They contain from five to fifteen, or even sixteen or seventeen per cent. of volatile matter. Among bituminous coals are reckoned Caking Coal, Non-caking Coal, Cannel or Parrot-coal, Torbanite, Brown-coal or Lignite, Earthy Brown Coal, and Mineral Charcoal. (See these words.)

bituminous limestone.

Geol.: Limestone impregnated with bitumen. Its colour is brown or black; in structure it is sonet es lamellar, but more frequently compact, in which case it is susceptible of a fine polish. When rubbed or heated it gives out an unpleasant bituminous odour. Occurs near Bristol, in Flintshire, and in Ireland in Galway. Abroad it is found in Dalmatia so bituminous that it may be cut like soap. The walls of houses are constructed of it, and after being erected are set on fire, when the bitumen burns out and the stone becomes white; the roof is then put on, and the house afterwards completed. (Phillips.) Bituminous limestone is of different geological ages.

bituminous mastic. Mastic formed of bitumen. The same as Bituminous Cement (q.v.).

bituminous schist.

Geol.: Schist impregnated with bitumen. Bituminous schist occurs in the Lower Silurian rocks of Russia. Sir R. Murchison considered that it arose from the decomposition of the fucoids imbedded in these rocks.

bituminous shale.

1. Geol.: Any shale impregnated with bitumen.

2. Spec.: An argillaceous shale so impregnated, which is very common in the coal measures. (Lyell: Princ. of Geol., Gloss.) bituminous springs. Springs more or less impregnated with bitumen.

bi-tŭ'-nĕn (pres. bituneth, pa. par. bituned), v.t. [A.S. pref. be, and tynan = to turn.] To enclose. (Legend of St. Katherine, ed. Morton, 1659.) (Stratmann.) bi-tûrn', bi-tŭr'-nĕn (pret. biturde), v.t. & i. [A.S. pref. be, and tyrnan = to turn.] To turn about. (Seinte Marherete, ed. Cockayne, xii. 33.) (Stratmann.)

bi-tw-âne, *bi-twēn', *bi-twêne', *bi-twu-ēn, *bi-twe'-nēn, *bi-twē'-nēn, *bi-twih, *bi-twige, *bi-tu-hen, prep. & adv. The same as Between (q.v.). (Story of Gen. & Exod., 3,251, &c.)

bi-twix'te, *bi-twix'te, *bi-twix, *bit-wēxe, *bi-twix'-ēn, *bi-twū x, *bi-tūx'e, *bi-tūx'-ĕn, *bit-thūx'-ĕn, prep. & adv. The same as Betwixt (q.v.).

bit'-ȳl, *byt'-ȳlle, s. [From A.S. bitel, bitel, bitela = a beetle, a coleopterous insect.] [Beetle.]

"... bytylle worme (bityl wyrme, K)."—Babeesens. Prompt. Parv.

bi'-ur-ĕt, s. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and Eng., &c., urea.]

Chem.: $C_2O_2N_3H_5$. Biuret is formed by heating urea, $CO(NH_2)_2$, to 150° to 160°, thus—

$$\begin{matrix} H_2N \\ H_2N \\ H_2N \end{matrix}\!\!>\!CO'' \quad = \quad \begin{matrix} H_2N \\ HN \\ H_2N \end{matrix}\!\!>\!CO'' \quad + \quad 3H_2$$

$$NH_2 \qquad\qquad CO''$$

The residue is heated with water; on cooling, biuret separates out in long white needle crystals which, when heated to 170°, decompose into ammonia and cyanuric acid ($C_3H_3N_3O_3$). Heated under current of dry hydrochloric acid gas (HCl), it yields grianidine (CH_5N_3) with other products. Biuret is detected by adding to its solution in water a few drops of $CuSO_4$ (cupric sulphate), and then excess of NaOH (caustic soda). The liquid turns red violet.

bi-uv-en, prep. & adv. [A.S. bufan = above.] (Stratmann.) bi-vălve, a. & s. [In Fr. bivalve (a. & s.); from Lat. bi = two, and valve (pl.) = the leaves, folds, or valves of a folding-door; from volvo = to roll.]

A. As adjective (Conchol., Zool., Bot., &c.): Having two valves. [B.]

"Three-fourths of the molluscs are univalve, or have but one shell, the others are mostly bivalve, or have two shells. . . ."—Woodward: Molluscs (ed. 1951), p. 20.

B. As substantive:

I. Zoology:

1. Gen.: A mollusc which has its shell in two opposite portions. This definition embraces both the Conchifera (Ordinary Bivalves), and the Brachiopoda, which are bivalves of a now abnormal character, though in early geological ages theirs was the prevalent type. [1.]

"The Brachiopoda are bivalves, having one shell placed on the back of the animal and the other in front."—Woodward: Molluscs, p. 7.

"The Conchifera, or ordinary bivalves (like the oyster) breathe by two pairs of gills, in the form of flat membranaceous plates attached to the mantle; one valve is applied to the right, the other to the left side of the body."—Ibid., p. 7

2. Spec.: A two-valved shell borne by a mollusc of the class Conchifera, sometimes called Lamellibranchiata, as distinguished from a Brachiopod. [See No. I. Conchifera, Lamellibranchiata, Brachiopod.]

"Fossil bivalves are of constant occurrence in all sedimentary rocks; they are somewhat rare in the oldest formations, but increase steadily in number and variety through the secondary and tertiary strata, and attain a maximum of development in existing seas."—Woodward: Manual of the Mollusca, p. 251.

RIGHT VALVE OF ARTEMIS EXOLETA.

a 1 The point of attachment of the anterior adductor muscle.
a 2 Do. of the posterior one.
c The cardinal tooth.
l l The lateral teeth.
p The pallial impression marking where the border of the mantle was attached.
s The sinus.

II. Geol.: Shells are the most useful of all fossils for ascertaining the geological age of strata; but bivalves are not so useful as univalves, being, with a few exceptions, marine, whilst some univalves are terrestrial, some fluviatile, lacustrine, or both, and yet others marine. Still bivalves will often enable a geologist approximately to sound the depths of a sea which has passed away untold ages before man was on the earth. [Shells.]

† III. Bot.: A pericarp which opens or splits into two valves or portions. Example—the legume of the common pea. [Bivalved.]

bi-vălv-oŭs, a. [Eng. bivalv(e); -ous.] The same as Bivalve, a. (q.v.).

bi-vălv'-ŭ-lar, a. [From Lat. prefix bi, and Mod. Lat. valvularis.] [Valvular.] Having two small valves. (Martin, c. 1754.)

bi-vălved, a. [Bivalve.]

1. Gen.: The same as Bivalve, a. (q.v.).

2. Spec. Bot.: The indusium in the fructification of some ferns.

bi-vault'-ĕd, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and Eng. vaulted.] Two-vaulted; having two vaults or arched roofs. (Barlow.) bi-vĕn'-tral, a. [From Lat. prefix bi = two, and ventralis = pertaining to the belly; venter = the belly.]

Anat.: Having two bellies; as "a biventral muscle." (Glossog. Nov.) biv i-al, a. [Mod. Lat. bivi(um); Eng. suff. -al.] Pertaining to the bivium (q.v.).

"The bivial ambulacra."—Huxley: Anat. Invert Animals, c. i., p. 570 biv-i-oŭs, a. [Lat bivius = having two ways or passages; prefix bi = two, and via = way.] Having two ways; offering two courses.

"In bivious theorems, and James faced doctrines, let virtuous consideration state the determination." Brown: Christ. Mor., ii. 3.

biv'-i-ŭm, s. [Lat. = a place where two ways meet.]

Rhet.: The two posterior ambulacra of Echinoderms, the three anterior ones being known as the trivium.

biv-ou-ăc, * bi'-hô-vac, * bi'-ô-vac, s

[In Fr. bivouac, bivac; Sp. bivac, vivac, vivaque; Dan. bivouac; Ger. †biwouk, beiwache; from bei = near, and wachen = to be awake, to watch; wache = a watch, a guard.] (Watch, Wake.]

1. Lit. (Mil. & Ord. Lang.): The remaining out without tents or other than extemporized shelter in a state of watchfulness ready for sudden attack.

"Bivouac, subaudi. bivouac, s. [Fr., from wey watch, a double guard, German.] A guard at night performed by the whole army, which either at a siege, or lying before an enemy, every evening draws out from its tents or huts, and continues all night in arms. Not in use."—Prevost. Harris.

2. Fig.: Exposure and other discomfort incident to human life.

"In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of life
Longfellow: A Psalm of Life.

¶ Johnson, it will be observed, says that this word in his time was "not in use" (as under No. 1). Since his time it has thoroughly revived.

biv'-ŏû-ăc, v.i. [From bivouac, s. (q.v.). In Ger. beiwachen, biwouaktiren; Fr. bivouaquer, bivaquer.] To spend the night on the ground without tents or other effective protection.

"We had not long bivouacked, before the barefooted son of the governor came down to reconnoitre us."—Darwin: Voyage round the World, ch. xiii.

biv'-ŏû-ăk-ĭng, pr. par. & a. [Bivouac, v.]

"As winter drew near, this bivouacking system became too dangerous to attempt."—De Quincey: Works (2nd ed.), i. 183.

* bi-wāke, * bi-waken, v.t. [The same as bewake (q.v.). A.S. wæccc = a watching, a wake.] To keep a wake or vigil for the dead.

"And eghte 'ole hun bi-waken xl nigtes and xl daiges"
Story of Gen. and Exod., 2,444-5.

* bi-wal'-ewe, * bi-wal'-wi-en, v.t. [A.S. bewealwian = to wallow.] To wallow about. (Layamon, 27,744.) (Stratmann.)

* bi-wĕd'-dĕn (pa. par. biweddel), v.t. [A.S. beweddian = to wed; beweddod = wedded.] To wed. (Layamon, 4,500.) (Stratmann.) bi-week'-ly, a. [From Lat. prefix bi, and Eng. weekly.] Occurring once in every two weeks. (Goodrich & Porter.)

¶ There is a certain ambiguity in this term, for some will assume that bi is the same as bis = twice, and will suppose anything bi-weekly to be twice a week. There is a similar ground for ambiguity about bi-monthly (q.v.).

* bi-wĕlle, * bi-wĕll-en, * bi'-wăll-en (pret. biwillede.) The same as Bewail (q.v.).

"And alle wepten, and biwilleden hir."—Wycliffe (Purvey): Luke viii. 52.

* bi-wĕn'-dĕn (pret. biwende, biwente), v.t. [A.S. bewendan = to turn; Mœso-Goth. biwandjan.] To wend about; to turn round. (O. Eng. Miscell., ed. Morris, 45.) (Stratmann.)

* bi-wēpe (pret. biwepte, biweop; pa. par. biwepe; pr. par. * biwepynge), v.t. The same as Beweep (q.v.). (Chaucer: Troilus, 5,585.)

"Rachel biwepynge hir sones . . ."—Wycliffe (Purvey): Matt ii. 18.

* bi-we-ven (pret. biwefle; pa. par. biweved, biwoven), v.t. To involve, to cover. The same as Bewave (2) (Scotch) (q.v.) (Layamon, 28,474.) (Stratmann.)

* bi-wey, s. [By way.]

* bi-wic-chen (pret. biwicched), v.t. The same as Bewitch (q.v.). (Piers Plow., bk. xix., 151.)

* bi-wi'-lĕn, * bi-wiye-li en (pa. par. biwiled), v.t. [From A.S. prefix bi, and wile = a wile, craftiness.] To wile, delude, or deceive. (Rel. Antiq., i. 182.) (Stratmann.) blăb, * blăbbe, v.t. & i. [In Ger. plappern = to blab, babble, prate, or chat.]

A. Transitive:

* 1. To utter, to tell, to communicate; not necessarily with imprudence or breach of confidence.

"That delightful engine of her thoughts
That blabb'd them with such pleasing eloquence.
Is torn from forth that pretty hollow cage Shakesp.: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 1.

2. To utter, tell, or communicate by word of mouth whatever is in one's mind, regardless whether imprudence is committed and friendly confidence violated.

"Nature has made man's breast no windows,
To publish what he does or intends;
Nor what dark secrets there remain Unless his own rash folly blabs it."
Butler.

3. To reveal a secret in any other way than by the lips.

"Sorrow nor joy can be disguised by art
Our forehead blabs the secrets of the heart."
Dryden.

B. Intransitive: To tell secrets of one's self or another imprudently; to tattle.

"Your mute will be
When my tongue blabs, then let mine eyes not see."
Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 4.

† blăb (1), * blabbe, s. [From blab, v.]

1. A person who by imprudent or treacherous speech reveals secrets.

"Blabbe or labbe wreyare of counsell, detector, revelator, H. P.]. . . .—Prompt. Parv.

black-act, s. An act so called because the outrages which caused it to be passed were committed by persons with blackened faces or otherwise disguised. It was sometimes more fully termed the Waltham black-act, because the locality of the crimes committed was Waltham Abbey in Essex. Epping Forest was in immediate proximity to Waltham. The act was 9 Geo. I., c. 22, which made a number of offences felony. Of these may be mentioned the setting fire to farm buildings, hay-stacks, &c., the breaking down of the heads of fish-ponds, killing or maiming cattle, hunting, wounding, or killing deer, robbing warrens with blackened faces or disguised, shooting at any one, or forcing people to aid in such unlawful acts. The Black Act was repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 27. (Blackstone: Comment, iv. 11, 15, 17, and other authorities.)

black-alder, black-aller, s. A shrub, Rhamnus frangula, the leaves of which are like those of alder, but blacker. One of the old names was Alnus nigra, of which Black-alder is a translation. There is, however, no real botanical affinity between the two plants.

black-amber, s. The name given by Prussian amber-diggers to jet. (Stormouth.) black archangel, s. A labiate plant, Ballota nigra, L., called also Black Horehound.

black art, s. Exorcism, the alleged ability to expel evil spirits from haunted houses or from persons bewitched; necromancy, or anything similar.

¶ The reason why it was called black was that proficients in it were supposed to be in league with the powers of darkness. A more scientific explanation would be that such an art is called black because it flourishes best amid physical and intellectual darkness.

Chem. manuf.: A mixture of twenty-five per cent. of caustic soda with calcium sulphide, quicklime, and unburnt coal, obtained in the process of making sodium carbonate. The mixture of sodium sulphate, chalk, and powdered coal is fused in a furnace, gases escape, and the residue is the black ash, which is lixiviated with warm water, and the solution evaporated to dryness, yields soda-ash, an impure sodium carbonate.

black assize, s.

Hist.: An assize held at Oxford in 1557, when the High Sheriff and 300 other persons died of infectious disease caught from the prisoners. It was called also the fatal assize.

And must for aye consort with black-brow'd night."
Shakesp.: Mid. Night's Dream, III. 2.

(2) Threatening, forbidding.

"Thus when a black-brow'd gust begins to rise, White foam at first on the curl'd ocean fries."
Dryden.

black-bryony, s. The English name of the Tamus, a genus of plants belonging to the order Smilaceæ (Sarsaparillas). The Common Black-bryony (Tamus communis) grows apparently wild in England. It has dioecious, greenish-white flowers, the males with six stamens and the females with a three-celled ovary, succeeded by a berry of three cells. The leaves are cordate and acute, the stems very long and twining in hedges, and the roots fleshy and exceedingly large. It is so acrid that it has been used as a stimulating plaster, but the young shoots are eaten like asparagus by the Moors, who boil them with oil and salt.

black-burning, a. Used of shame, when it is so great as to produce deep blushing, or to crimson the countenance.

black canker, s. A disease in turnips and other crops produced by a kind of caterpillar. Dr. Willich recommended that a number of ducks should be turned into the fields infected by these insects.

black-cap, blackcap, black cap, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

1. Lit. (of the form black cap).

(1) Gen.: Any cap of a black colour.

(2) Spec.: A cap of a black colour put on by a judge when about to pronounce sentence of death on a criminal. It is popularly believed that the black colour is designed to symbolise the fatal effect the sentence is about to produce, but in reality the black cap is a part of a judge's full dress, and is worn on state occasions, even though no fatal sentences have to be pronounced.

2. Fig. (of the forms blackcap and black-cap) Various birds having the upper part of the heads—that in the case of man often covered by a cap—black; or cap may in this case be from A.S. cop = the top or summit of anything. Specially

(1) A name for the Black-cap Warbler, Curruca atricapilla. It is so called from the black colour which exists on the crown of the head in the male, the corresponding part in the female being an umber or rusty colour. In the former sex the back of the neck is ashy-brown, the upper parts of the body grey with a greenish tinge, the quills and tail dusky edged with dull-green, the under parts light-ash colour. The female is darker and more greenish. The Black-cap is about six inches in length. It occurs in Britain from April to October, builds a nest in hawthorn bushes or similar places, deposits four, five, or six reddish-brown mottled eggs, and is a sweet songster.

A. As substantive:

1. A popular name of the fruit of the common Bramble, Rubus fruticosus or of some other allied species; also of the shrub on which it grows. Blackberries ripen in the south of England in the latter part of August and the early portion of September. They are abundant in parts of the United States and are largely cultivated here, culture and selection having rendered their fruit much larger and more palatable.

2. The sloe, Prunus spinosa. (Britten, &c.)

B. As adj.: Consisting of blackberries, as blackberry jam.

black-bird, s. [Eng. black; bird.] A well-known British bird, the Turdus merula. Other English names sometimes given to it are the Merle, the Garden Ousel, or simply the Ousel. A book-name is also the Black Thrush. The male is black, with the bill yellow; the female is deep brown above, lighter beneath, the throat and forepart pale brown with darker streaks; the young dusky brown above with dull yellowish streaks, whilst beneath they have dusky spots. Length, including tail, ten inches; expansion of wings, fifteen inches. There are several varieties, one of them white. The blackbird is a permanent resident in Britain. It feeds in winter on snails, breaking their shells by dashing them against a stone, and also on earthworms and berries. It pairs in February or March. The blackbirds of the United States differ in family from those just described, and comprise several genera and species, being known familiarly as the Crow Blackbird, the Red Wing Blackbird, the Yellow-headed Blackbird, &c. They are very abundant, and one or other of them is found in almost every part of the country. The song of the blackbird is much admired.

A. As substantive:

1. Sing. and plur., and often as compounds and separate words: Monks of the Dominican order. The name was given from the colour of the habit which they wore. (Dominican.)

In England they [the Dominicans] were called Black Friars from the colour of their habit, and the part of London where they first dwelt is still called by that name. Warwick: Note in Mosheim's Ch. Hist., cent. xiii., pt. ii., ch. ii.

2. Plur.: The region in London first inhabited by the Dominican friars. [A., I.]

"When not a Puritan in Black-Friers will trust
So much as for a feather."
B. Jonson: Alchym., i. 1. (Nares.)

B. As adjective: Pertaining to the Dominican monks called Blackfriars; situated in the region of London which they inhabited; more frequently of the bridge or the theatre formerly in that locality.

¶ The theatre there was attended by more respectable people than any other on the side of the Thames.

"But you that can contract yourselves, and sit
As you were now in the Black Friers pit,
And will not deal in with loud noise and leagues."
Shirley: The New Playes (1653). (Nares.)

black guard (ck and u silent),  blăck guard (u silent), s. & a. [Eng. black; guard.]

A. As substantive:

 I. With the two words wholly separate:

 1. Originally. (In a literal sense): The humbler servants in a wealthy household who, when journeys were in progress, rode among the pots, pans, and other household utensils to protect or guard them. No moral imputation was conveyed in calling them, as was done, the black guard. All that was implied was that they were apt to become begrimed on a journey by the vessels in proximity to which they sat.

"A slave that within these twenty years rode with the black guard in the Duke's carriage amongst spits and stripping pans."—Webster: The White Devil. (Trench: Select Glossary.)

2. Next. (Figuratively): Persons morally black or begrimed; persons of bad character.

"Thieves and murderers took upon them the cross to escape the gallows, adulterers did penance in their armour. A lamentable case that the devil's black guard should be God's soldiers."—Fuller: The Holy War, i. 12. (Trench: Select Glossary.)

II. Having the two words combined, first with a hyphen and then altogether: With the same meaning as No. 2. Specially used of a low fellow with a scurrilous tongue. (Rather rare.)

B. As adjective:

 1. Of persons: Serving.

"Let a black guard boy be always about the house to send on errands and go to market for you on rainy days."—Swift.

blăck mā'il, s. [Eng. black, and A.S. mal = tribute, toll-dues; or from Norm. Fr. mail, mayle, male = a half penny.]

1. Law: Quit-rents reserved in work, grain, &c.; in contradistinction to payments reserved in "white money," that is, in silver. (Blackstone: Comment., ii. 3.)

2. Ord. Lang. & Law: Money paid from motives of prudence, not from legal obligation, by owners of property to freebooters and similar worthies, or their confederates or chiefs, as the price of protection from being plundered, or worse. The system of paying blackmail, which once flourished in the North of England and the South of Scotland, was declared illegal in the former country by the 43 Elizabeth, c. 13, but it flourished in the Highlands of Scotland till after the battle of Culloden, in 1745.

". . . but the boldest of them [the 'thieves] will never steal a hoof from any one that pays blackmail to Vich Ian Vohr."

"And what is blackmail?"

". . . A sort of protection-money that Low country gentlemen and heritors lying near the Highlands pay to some Highland chief, that he may neither do them harm himself, nor suffer it to be done to them by others: and then if your cattle are stolen, you have only to send him word and he will recover them: or it may be, he will drive away cows from some distant place where he has a quarrel and give them to you to make up your loss."—Scott: Waverly, ch. xv.

blăck'-mā'il, v.t. To extort or attempt to extort money by threats; spec., by threats of exposure of some alleged misdoing on the part of the person so threatened.

* blăck'-mōor, s. [BLACKAMOOR.] (Browne.) blăck'-nĕss, * blăk'-nĕs, * blake-nesse, s. [Eng. black; suff. -ness.] The quality of being black.

A. As substantive:

I. Literally:

1. Ord. Lang. & Animal Physiol.

(1) A membranous bag in man and the higher animals, designed for the retention of the urine. This being the most important structure of the kind in the frame is called, by way of prominence, the bladder; any other one is distinguished from it by a word prefixed, as the gall-bladder (q.v.).

"The bladder should be made of a membranous substance, and extremely dilatable for receiving and containing the urine, till an opportunity of emptying it."—Ray.

¶ The bladder of an ox, a sheep, &c., when dried may be inflated with air, and used as a float for nets, or for other purposes. Sometimes its buoyancy is taken advantage of to keep those learning to swim from sinking, while as yet they are unable to support themselves unaided in the water.

"Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders."
Shakesp.: Rom. & Jul., iii. 5.

At other times a bladder may be used as part of a rude wind instrument.

". . . and with dance
And music of the bladder and the bag Beguile their woes . . ."
Cowper: Task, iii.

(2) A vesicle, a pustule, a blister, especially if filled with air instead of pus.

". . . bladders full of impostume."
Shakesp.: Troil. & Cress., v. 1.

2. Bot.: A structure of a membranous texture bulged out or inflated. Used:

(1) Of a calyx or pericarp.

bladder-fern, s. The English name of the fern genus Cystopteris. The veins are forked, the sori roundish with involucres fixed at their base, and opening by a free extremity generally lengthened. There are two British species, the Brittle and the Mountain Bladder-ferns (Cystopteris fragilis and montana). A third, the Lacinulate Bladder-fern (C. dentata), has not been found recently.

BLADDER-FERN (FERTILE PINNA AND SPORI).

bladder-green, s. A green colour obtained from the berries of a shrub, Rhamnus catharticus.

bladder-herb, s. A plant of the Nightshade family, Physalis Alkekengi, L. The name is given from its inflated calyx, which strangely it was supposed to be useful in diseases of the bladder. (Prior, &c.)

† bladder kelp, s. A seaweed, Fucus vesiculosus, found on the coasts of Britain and elsewhere. It is called also Bladder-wrack.

I. Bot.: The English name of Staphylea, the typical genus of the order of the Staphyleaceæ (Bladder-nuts). The name is derived from the inflated capsules. The flowers have five stamens and two styles. The common Bladder-nut, Staphylea pinnata, is found in Eastern Europe. It has also been in gardens at one or two places in Britain, but is not entitled to a place in the flora. The three-leaved Bladder-nut, Staphylea trifolia, is American.

2. Plural Bladder-nuts: Lindley's English name for an order of plants, the STAPHYLEACEÆ (q.v.).

bladder-pod, s. The English name of a papilionaceous plant genus, Physol[illegible].

bladder-seed, s. The English name of Physospermum, a genus of umbelliferous plants.

bladder-senna, s. The English name of Colutea, a genus of plants belonging to the papilionaceous sub-order of the Leguminosæ.

The term bladder in their name refers to the inflation of the membraneceous legumes, and owes to the fact that the leaves of Colutea arborescens, which grows on Mount Vesuvius, are said to be a substitute for that medicinal fruit.

bladder-ememt, s. The Bladder-wort (Utricularia vulgaris).

bladder-tree, s. A name sometimes given to an American shrub or small tree, Staphylea trifolia. It is called also the Three-leaved Bladder-nut. [BLADDER-NUT.]

bladder-wort, s. The English name of Utricularia, a genus of Scrophulariaceous plants. Both the English and the scientific appellations refer to the fact that the leaves bear at their margins small bladders. There are three British species, the Greater, the Intermediate, and the Lesser Bladder-worts (Utricularia vulgaris, intermedia, and minor.) [UTRICULARIA.]

bladder wrack, s. A name sometimes given to a sea-weed, Fucus vesiculosus, L., found on our shores. [BLADDER-KELP.]

blâ'm-a-bl-nês, blâ'm-e-a-bl-nês, s. [Eng. blamable; -ness.] The quality of being blamable or culpable; faultiness, reprehensibleness.

"Scripture mentioneth its sometimes freer use, than at other, without the least blamablenesse."—Whitlock: Manners of the English, p. 208.

". . . no such thing as acceptableness to God when he did well, and blamablenesse when he did otherwise"—Sanderson: Wint. Bp. Conference, p. iii.

blâ'm-a-bl-lŷ, blâ'm-e-a-bl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. blamable; -ly.] In a manner to merit blame or censure, censurably, reprehensibly.

"A person may be carried on against a person that is manifestly or blamably absent, even . . . a definitive sentence."—Ayliffe.

* blâ-mâk-ing, s. [From Scotch blae, bla = livid; and Eng. making.] The act of making livid, or discolouring by means of a stroke. (Scotch.)

"Convict for the bind-drawing, blamaking, and strublens."—Aberdeen Kegist (1580). (Jamieson.)

* blâme (1), v.t. [In Dut blaam = to blame, to blemish.]

1. To blemish.

"No blame your honor with so shameful vaunt Of vile revenge." Spenser: F. Q., II. viii. 16.

2. To injure.

"To banquer came I alle a mansel,
The which shorte me hadde blamed."
The Romaunt of the Rose.

blâme (2), * blâme, * blâ-men, v.t. & i. [In Fr. blâmer; Norm. Fr. blasmer; Prov. & O. Sp. blasmar; Ital. biasimare; Lat. blasphemo; Gr. βλασφήμω (blasphêmô), (1) to speak profanely of God or anything sacred; (2) to speak injuriously or slanderously of a man.] [BLASPHEME.]

A. Transitive: To find fault with, to censure, to express disapproval of. Formerly, it sometimes had the preposition of before the fault.

"Tomyrus he blamed of inconsiderate rashness."—Knolles: History of the Turks.

Now such expressions are used as for, because of, on account of.

"He blamed Dryden for sneering at the Pterophants of Apis."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. i.

B. Intransitive: Only in the expression to blame = to be blamed.

¶ Johnson hesitated whether to call blame in such a phrase as "you are to blame," an infinitive of a verb or a noun with such a construction as in the French a tort = by wrong, wrongfully. He inclines to consider it the latter one; with more reason Professor Bain and others regard it as the former.

"He could not but feel that, though others might have been to blame, he was not himself blameless."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between the verbs to blame, to reprove, to reproach, to upbraid, to censure, and to condemn:—"The expression of one's disapprobation of a person, or of that which he has done, is the common idea in the signification of these terms; but to blame expresses less than to reprove. We simply charge with a fault in blaming; but in reproving severity is mixed with the charge. Reproach expresses more than either; it is to blame acrimoniously. . . . To blame and reprove are the acts of a superior; to reproach, upbraid, that of an equal; to censure and condemn leave the relative condition of the agent and the sufferer undefined. Masters blame or reprove their servants; parents, their children; friends and acquaintances reproach and upbraid each other; persons of all conditions may censure or be censured, condemn or be condemned, according to circumstances. . . . Blame and reproof are dealt out on every ordinary occasion; reproach and upbraid respect personal matters, and always that which affects the moral character; censure and condemnation are provoked by faults and misconduct of different descriptions." Blame, reproach, upbraid, and condemn may be applied to ourselves, reproof and censure are applied to others. We blame ourselves for acts of imprudence; our consciences reproach us for our weaknesses, and upbraid or condemn us for our sins. (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* blâme (1), s. [From O. Eng. blame (1), v. (q.v.); injury, hurt.

"His toward perill, and untoward blame
Which by this new remainder he shall pose."
Spenser: F. Q., III. i. 5.

blâme (2), s. [Fr. blâme; Prov. blasme, blasma; Ital. biasimo; Lat. blasphemia, or βλασφημια (blasphêmia) = (1) profanity, (2) slander.] [BLAME, v. BLASPHEMY.]

1. The act of censuring any one, the expression of censure for some fault or crime. The act of imputing demerit to any one on account of a fault; the state of being censured or found fault with.

"They were insensible to praise and blame, to promises and threats."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

2. Anything for which censure is expressed, anything blameworthy; demerit, a fault, a misdemeanour, a crime.

¶ Often used in the phrase "To lay the blame upon"—i.e., to assign or attribute the fault to the person named as believing that he committed it. (In this sense it once had a plural.)

"They lay the blames on the poor little men sometimes passionately enough, to divert it from themselves."—Locke.

◊ To charge the blame upon: The same as to lay the blame on (q.v.).

"In arms, the praise of success is shared among many; yet the blame of misadventure is charged upon one."—Raymond.

blâ'me-a-bl-ie, a. [BLAMABLE.]

blâ'me-a-bl-nês-nês, s. [BLAMABLENESS.]

blâ'me-a-bl-lŷ, adv. [BLAMABLY.]

blâmed, pa. par. & a. [BLAME, v.] blâme'-fûl, † blâme'-fûll, a. [Eng. blame, and full.] Full of material for censure; blameworthy. Used—

(1) Of persons.

"Is not the causer of these timeless deaths
As blameful as the executioner" Shakesp.: Rich. II., I. ii. 4.

(2) Of things.

"Thy mother took into her blameful bed Shakesp.: 1 Hen. VI., v. iv. 4.

blâme'-fûl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. blameful, and -ly = like.] In a blameful manner, so as to merit heavy censure. (Webster.)

blâme'-fûl-nês, s. [From blameful.] The state or quality of being blameful; the state or quality of meriting severe censure. (Webster.) blâme'-lês, * blame lesse, * blame'-lês, a. [From Eng. blame, and suff. -less = without.] Without meriting blame. Used—

(1) Of a person.

". . . that we may be found of him in peace without spot, and blameless."—2 Pet. iii. 14.

(2) Of conduct or life.

"But they were, for the most part, men of blameless life, and of high religious profession."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

¶ 1. Grammatical usage:

† (1) It is sometimes, but rarely, followed by of placed before that with regard to which censure has or might have arisen. Such expressions as "with regard to," "in reference to," or "respecting" have now all but superseded of.

"We will be blameless of this thine oath."—Josh. ii. 17.

(2) It is sometimes followed by to placed before the person or Being who has a right to pronounce censure.

"She found out the righteous, and preserved him blameless unto God."—Wisdom x. 5.

¶ 2. Precise signification:

Crabb thus distinguishes between blameless, irreprehensible, unblemished, . . . unblamable, spotless.—"Blameless is less than unblamable; what is blameless is simply free from blame, but that which is irreprehensible cannot be blamed, or have any reproach attached to it. It is good to say of a man that he leads a blameless life, but it is a much greater thing to say, that he leads an irreprehensible life: the former is but the negative praise of one who is known only for his harmlessness; the latter is the positive commendation of a man who is well known for his integrity in the different relations of society. Unblemished and unspotted are applicable to many objects, besides that of personal conduct; and when applied to this, their original meaning is scarcely points out their use in distinction from the two former. We may say of a man that he has an irreproachable or an unblemished reputation, and a unspotted or spotless purity of life." (Crabb Eng. Synon.) blame less ly, adv. [Eng. blameless; -ly] In a blameless manner, innocently; without being worthy of censure.

with that conviction against which he cannot blamelessly withstand pertinacity, build out. —Hare

A. & B. As present participle & participial adjective: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As substantive: The art of rendering materials colourless. This is done by exposing them to the actinic rays of the sun, or by the action of bleaching agents. The chief of these is called bleaching-powder. It is chloride of lime, and is prepared by exposing moistened quicklime to the action of chlorine, when hypochlorite and chloride of calcium are formed, the former being the bleaching agent. By the action of an acid on good bleaching-powder thirty per cent. of chlorine is liberated. Substances are bleached by alternately dipping them in dilute solutions of bleaching-powder and of dilute sulphuric acid. Bleaching-powder is also used to purify an offensive or infectious atmosphere.

bleaching-liquid, s. A liquid used for taking colour out of cloth or thread.

bleaching-powder, s. A powder employed for the same purpose. There are several, but the one generally used consists of chloride of lime. [BLEACHING, C.]

On the bleak wilderness of life alone."
Hemans: The Abencerrage.

bleak-faced, a. (Scotch.)

* 1. Lit.: Having a "bleak," i.e., a pallid face. [BLEAK, 1.]

2. Fig.: Having a bleak aspect. In the subjoined example the reference is primarily to the desolate aspect of the country on the 2nd November (Hallowmas), and then to the dispiriting memories of death which the Roman Catholic festival of All Souls, held on that day, inspires.

"As bleak-fac'd Hallowmas returns."
Burns: The Two Dogs.

blēȧk, * blēa, † blētk, † blīck, † blēis, † blāy, s. [In Ger. blicke. Named from its "bleak" or white colour.] [BLEAK, a.] A fish, the Leuciscus alburnus of Cuvier, belonging to the family Cyprinidæ. It is a river fish five or six inches long, and is found in Britain. It is said to be one of those fishes the scales of which are employed in the manufacture of artificial pearls. [ALBUM, 2.]

"The bleak, or freshwater sprat, is ever in motion, and therefore called by some the river swallow. His back is of a pleasant, sea-water green: his belly white and shining like the mountain snow. Bleaks are excellent meat, and in best season in August."—Walton.

"Alburnus. An qui nostratibus, the Bleke?"—Gibb.: Scot., p. 25. (Jamieson.)

* blēȧked, a. [Eng. bleak; -ed.] Made "bleak," pallid, or pale

"By the fourthe seale, the beast, the voyce, and the pale horse mayest thou understande the heretykes, whiche dyd dyverse wayes and a long tyme vexe the holy churche with false doctrine. And haue made it as it were pale & bleaked for very sorow & heuynes."—Udal.: Rev., ch. vi.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Subjectively. Of the mental perception: Dull, obfuscate.

(2) Objectively: Looking dim, obscure, obfuscate to the mental vision which beholds it; deceptive, illusory.

"Thus I hurl
My dazzling spells into the spongy air
Of power to cheat the eye with blear illusion,
And give it false presentments."—Milton: Comus.

B. As substantive: Anything which renders the eyes sore and watery or which dims vision.

"'Tis nae to be wonder'd with unco fouk ye see Nor is the blear drawn easy over her ee."
Burns: Holinesse, p. 91. (Jamieson.)

¶ Sometimes used in the plural. (Scotch.)

"I think ane man, sir, of your years Suld not be blyndit with the bleyrs."
Philotus. S. P. Reps., iii. 7. (Jamieson.) blear-eye, s. An eye which has its vision obscured by watery humour.

blear-eyed, * blear-eeyde, * bleare-eyed, * bler-eyed, * bler-ied, * blear-sighed, * bler-yed, * blere-eyed, a. Having blear eyes. Used—

1. Lit. Of eyes: Having watery sore eyes, with dimmed sight.

(1) Gen. Of those of man.

(2) Of those of the owl: This sense is founded on inaccurate observation; the owl has no defect of vision, the idea no doubt having arisen from its frequent blinking in the daylight.

"It is no more in the power of calumny to blast the dignity of an honest man, than of the blear-eyed owl to cast scandal on the sun."—L'Estrange.

(3) Of the eyes of any imaginary being personified in human form.

"Yes, the year is growing old And his eye is pale and bleared."
Longfellow: Midnight Mass for the Dying Year.

2. Figuratively. Of man's mental perception: Dull, obfuscate. [BLEAK, A., I. 2.]

longing to the order Polypodiaceæ. The sterile fronds are pectinato-pinnatifid and horizontal; the fertile ones pinnated and erect with numerous segments. Both are smooth. The pinnæ are linear, bluntish, entire, nearly equal at base. Along the back of the fronds in these fern... the spore-cases are arranged in a long, narrow, continuous line on each side of the mid-rib. This line has a covering in its early stages, but it soon splits down the side next the mid-rib, and the spore-cases appear to cover the whole under-surface of the fronds. The sori at first are distant from the margin, while in the very closely allied genus Lomaria they are truly marginal. The Hard-fern most resembles the Bracken in the fruiting. It will readily grow on rockwork in the open air. Cool, shady places suit it best.

II. Theology:

¶ Under the Jewish ceremonial law it was enjoined that no animal should be vowed and offered in sacrifice unless it were without blemish, Lev. xxii. 20, 21. See also Exod. xii. 5; Lev. i. 3; xiv. 10; Numb. xxix. 8, &c., &c. What were held to constitute blemishes in an animal may be learned from Lev. xxii. 21—25. The general opinion of theologians is that this absence of blemish was designed to typify the spotless character of Christ.

"[illegible] he shall take two he lambs without blemish, and one ewe lamb of the first year without blemish."—Lev. xiv. 10.

"But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot."—1 Pet. i. 19.

(2) Blemish, defect, and fault are thus distinguished:—"Blemish respects the exterior of an object; defect consists in the want of some specific property in an object; fault conveys the idea not only of something wrong, but also of its relation to the author. There is a blemish in fine china; a defect in the springs of a clock; and a fault in the contrivance. An accident may cause a blemish in a fine painting; the course of nature may occasion a defect in a person's speech, but the carelessness of the workman is evinced by the faults in the workmanship. A blemish may be easier remedied than a defect is corrected or a fault repaired." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) blend (1),  blende, * blén -den, * blán -den (pret. blended, † blent; pa. par. blended, † blent, † blend, blend, blan) (Scotch), v.t. & i. [A.S. blendan, pret. blænd, pa. par. blanden; Icel. blanda; Dan. blande; Sw. & Icel. blanda; Dut. blenden = to mingle. In Sw. & Icel. blanda; Dan. blande = to mix; O. H. Ger. blantan.]

A. As transitive:

To mix together in such a way that the things mixed cannot easily be separated again; to combine, to confound. Used—

I. In an indifferent sense:

(1) Lit.: Of two liquids, or two gases, or anything similar. (In this sense it is often used of the mixture of two kinds of whiskey.) Less properly of the mechanical apposition of a solid and a liquid.

(2) Figuratively:

(a) Of persons uniting from the blood of two distinct races.

"Indians and emmarads blended in various degrees." Darwin. Descent of Man, vol. i., pt. i., ch. vii. p. 2.

(b) Of things generally.

"Have we not blent that fair name belong To him that blends no fable with his song?"
Cowper. Hope.

 2. In a bad sense: To spoil, to corrupt, to debase, or blemish by such intermixture; or simply to blemish.

"Yet did thou blamest me for having blent
My name with guile and traiterous intent."
Spenser. F. Q., i. vi. 42.

B. Intrans.: To become mixed, or to be mixed, in the same senses and connections as the transitive.

blénd, s. [BLEND (1), v.]

1. A mixing of different qualities of a commodity, as of tea, tobaccos, or whiskey.

2. The commodity resulting from such mixture.

blende, blénd, s. [In Ger. blende = (1) a blind, a folding-screen, a mock window, (2) the mineral described below; from blenden = to blind, to dazzle.]

1. Min.: A native sulphide of zinc (ZnS). Composition: Sulphur, 32·82; zinc, 44·67—often sometimes with smaller amounts of iron and cadmium. It occurs in regular tetrahedra, dodecahedra, and other monometric forms; it is found also fibrous, columnar, radiated, plumose, massive, foliated, granular, &c. Its colour is either white, yellow, or brown-black. Different varieties of it exist in Derbyshire, Cumberland, and Cornwall, as well as on the Continent of Europe, in America, &c. The Derbyshire variety is called by the miners "Black jack." [No. 2. See also BLACK-JACK.] Blende is called also Sphalerite, &c. Dana divides it into (1) Ordinary zinc blende containing blende or sphalerite, little or no iron. [CLEIOPHANE.] (2) Ferriferous containing 10 or more per cent. of iron. [MARMATITE.] (3) Cadmiferous (containing cadmium). [PRZIBRAMITE.] (Dana, &c.)

2. Manufac.: The above-mentioned "Black-jack" treated by roasting and distillation in combination with charcoal in a vessel from which the air is excluded. By means of air the metal burns and passes off as the white oxide which is collected and forms a pigment known as zinc-white.

 blét -ed -ness (pret. & pa. par. blessed, blest, * blessede, * blissed, * blessede, * blessede, * bletsed), v.t. & i. [A.S. bletsian, bledsian = to bless; O. Northumb. bledsa. These forms point to an orig. bledsan (not found) = to redden with blood. Sweet suggests that in heathen times it was primarily used in the sense of consecrating the altar by sprinkling it with the blood of the sacrifice. (Skeat.) In folk-etymology the word has been confused with bless.

bless (1), v.

A. Transitive:

1. To consecrate; to set apart for a holy or sacred purpose:

"And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it."—Gen. ii. 3.

2. To hallow with prayer and religious rites, to ask a blessing on (as food).

3. To sign with the sign of the cross as a defence against evil.

"He lifts up his hand and blessed him then, and recommended him to God almighty."—Sir Eglamour, 356.

¶ In this sense it is also reflexive:

"The more devout Arose and blessed themselves from dread to flee."
Drayton: Mood's Earth, v. 51.

4. To protect from evil (prob. originally by signing with a cross).

"Bless me from this we man."
Fletcher: Wild-goose Chase, i. 3.

5. To wish or pray for, or to prophesy or promise happiness, success, or advantage to, another; to pronounce a benediction upon.

"Whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance."—Isa. xix. 25.

6. To render happy or successful, or confer advantage upon, by giving one a gift, by acquitting one from a charge, by preserving one, by promising or prophesying to the future happiness in this world or the next, or in any other way.

"The quality of mercy is not strained.
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed:
It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes."
Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

7. To felicitate or congratulate, on being for the time happy, or expecting to be so in the future.

"Then Toi sent Joram his son unto king David, to salute him, and to bless him, because he had fought against Hadarezer, and smitten him: for Hadarezer had war with Toi."—2 Sam. viii. 10.

8. To extol, to magnify, praise, or glorify.

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ."—Eph. i. 3.

B. Intrans.: To give thanks.

"Blesseth on and gledeth."—Ancren Riwle, p. 258.

 bléss (2),  bliss (pret. & pa. par. blist), v.t. [From Fr. blesser = to hurt, to injure.] To wound, to strike, to beat.

"The battle . . . when they blessed your worship's cheek teeth."—Skelton: Don Quixote, I. iii. 173.

 bléss (3), v.t. [Etym. doubtful; probably a special meaning of bless (1) or bless (2); hardly an independent word. (N.E.D.)]

1. To wave about, to brandish.

"They . . . burning blades about their heades doe blesse."
Spenser: F. Q., I. v. 6.

2. To brandish (a weapon) round.

"His armed head with his sharp blade he blest."
Fairfax: Tasso, xx. 67.

C. As participial adjective. Spec.—

1. Of persons or Beings

(1) Happy

"Blest country, where these kingly glories shine!
Blest England if this happiness be thine!"
Cowper: Table Talk.

(2) Holy.

"When you are desirous to be blest, I'll blessing beg of you."
Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 4.

(3) Worthy of great veneration (the idea of holiness and happiness still remaining).

(a) Worthy of absolutely limitless veneration, all-adorable, as the Blessed Trinity.

(b) Worthy of high veneration, as "the Blessed Virgin."

"And then their worship of images, and invocation of Angels and Saints, and the blessed Virgin, in the same solemn manner, and for the same blessings and benefits which we beg of God himself."—Tillotson (3rd ed. 1723), vol. i., ser. ix.

2. Of things: Producing happiness, bestowing health and prosperity:

"... of mingled prayer they told . . . of Sabbath hours
Of meek farewell and evening's blessed greeting."
Hemans: Funeral of Madame Langhans.

D. As substantive (formed by omitting the noun or pronoun with which the adjective blessed or blest agrees): Happy people or beings

1. In a general sense.

2. Spec.: Persons or beings happy in the other world.

blessed fair, a. Blessedly fair, happy as well as fair.

"But what is so blessed-fair that fears no blot?"
Shakesp.: Sonnet 82.

blessed thistle, s. The English name of a thistle, Cnicus benedictus, formerly called Carduus benedictus. Both the English name and the Latin specific appellation refer to the fact that formerly it was believed to destroy intestinal worms, to cure fevers, the plague, and even the most stubborn ulcers and cancers, an opinion for which there seems to have been no foundation whatever.

 bles -sede, pret. of v. [BLESS.]

He was deprived of his command of the Bounty by mutineers on board, and turned adrift in his shirt, with eighteen of the crew, in a small launch, on the 28th April, 1789; reached Timor on 14th June of the same year, and England on March 14, 1790; was sent again in 1791 (and this time successfully) to carry out his original mission; became Governor of New South Wales in 1806, and on 26th January, 1809, was arrested and deposed for tyranny.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Sapindaceæ (Soapworts). Blighia sapida is the ash-leaved Akee-tree. [AKEE.] Blighia is now considered only a synonym of Cupania (q.v.).

blight (gh silent), s. [Etym. unknown. It appears to have come into the language early in the seventeenth century. (In Colgrave, 1611.) Cf. blichening. The reference would be either to the pale colour of some hair withered plants or to the wood of a tree laid bare through the stripping of the bark by means of lightning.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Gen.: Any physical cause unfavourably affecting the growth of cereal plants, flowers, fruits, or whatever else is cultivated, nipping the buds, making the leaves and blossoms curl up and wither, imparting to them a sickly yellow hue, covering them with spots of an abnormal colour, or injuring them in any similar way

2. Spec.: A certain noxious influence in the air, of which the haze often seen in hot weather is the accompaniment, which is popularly supposed to injure plants, either directly by destroying their vitality, or indirectly by calling into existence fungi and insects, to which they become a prey. (For the real explanation of the phenomena, see II.)

"Ah, gracious heaven! attend
His fervent prayer, restrain the tempest's rage,
The dreadful blight disarm."
Dudley: Husbandry, c. 3.

3. Figuratively:

(1) Anything which makes a person droop, or that which is fruitful or valuable waste away, decay, and die.

"When you come to the proof once, the first blight of frost shall most infallibly strip you of all your glory."—L'Estrange.

(2) The act of causing to wither; the state of being withered.

"But should there be to whom the fatal blight
Of fatting Wisdom yields a base delight."
Byron: Speech of Rt. Hon. W. B. Sheridan.

II. Science: To explain the effects on plants described under No. I., recourse must be had to the teachings of meteorology, botany, and zoology

1. Meteor.: If in early spring, when the shoots of plants are tender and succulent, and exhale much moisture, the east wind, which is dry as well as cold, blow upon them, it makes the plants part with their moisture too rapidly, and thus does them injury. If night frosts congeal the moisture in the delicate tissues, these are likely to be rent asunder and die. The turbid and hazy state of the atmosphere, to which so much evil is popularly attributed, is caused by difference of temperature between the earth and the air, and has not in it anything noxious to vegetation.

"I complained to the oldest and best gardeners, who often fell into the same misfortune, and esteemed it some blight of the spring."—Temple.

2. Botany:

(1) Gen.: Many "blights" are produced by the attacks of parasitic fungi. The late Rev. M. J. Berkeley, the fungologist, believed that the fungi which in some cases have arrested the development of corn and other cereals, and made the plants decay, have attacked their roots, having grown originally on the decomposing remains of the previous year's crop still rooted in the ground. [BARBERRY BLIGHT, MILDEW, RUST, &c.]

(2) Specially:

(a) Plants of the fungoid genus Ustilago. (Masham.)

(b) The English name of the fungoid genus Rubigo. It is called also Mildew (q.v.)

3. Zool.: Other "blights" are produced by the attacks of insects. The curling up of leaves generally arises from the caterpillars of lepidopterous insects. Some caterpillars hatched from eggs deposited inside leaves mine within the latter unseen for a time. For instance, those of the Small Ermine Moth (Yponomeuta padella) do so when young; then, when grown sufficiently, they emerge in untold numbers and commence to devour the leaves themselves. Curled leaves often shelter Aphides, and sometimes Coccidæ [APHIS, Coccus]. Galls are formed by Gall-flies [CYNIPS]. Species of many other genera and families can "blight" plants. [AMERICAN BLIGHT.]

blight (gh silent), * blite (O. Scotch), v.t. & i. [From blight, s., or vice versâ.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

The blind: Blind people taken collectively.

"The blind receive their sight . . ."—Matt. xi. 5.

¶ For the causes which produce blindness see BLINDNESS. The number of blind average about 1 to 1,000 of the population, so that there are approximately 50,000 blind persons in the United States. The deprivation of sight in an individual makes him attend to his other senses, which by continued exercise become more acute. The intellectual development of the blind is not prevented by their infirmity nearly so much as it is in the case of the deaf, and the list of blind men who have distinguished themselves is a long one. When modern Christian philanthropy began to turn special attention to the blind, it was thought enough to furnish them here and there with an "asylum" [BLIND ASYLUM]; the extent to which they could be educated by proper means was not as yet understood. The Abbé Valentine Haüy will for ever be gratefully remembered by the blind, he having established the first school for their education in Paris in 1784. Two years later he had books for their benefit printed in raised or embossed characters. In his footsteps have followed Mr. Jas. Gall of Edinburgh, Mr. John Alstone of Glasgow, Dr. How of America, Mr. Lucas of Bristol, Mr. Frere of London, Mr. Moon of Brighton, Mr. Wait of New York, and others. About 1868 the whole Bible was printed at Glasgow in raised Roman characters, and in 1855–6 the Rev. W. Taylor, F.R.S., edited a sixpenny magazine for the benefit of the blind.

blind-al'-ley, blind alley, s. An alley which has no exit except by the aperture through which entrance was made.

Arch.: A space around the basement wall of a house to keep it dry.

blind asylum, s. An asylum for the blind, properly a place where the blind may obtain an inviolate place of refuge, which was all that was originally thought of in connection with them; now their education is a primary object, though the word is still often retained. Of late years schools for the blind, &c., one was founded by Mennatingen by Wenzel VI. in 1379, and one in Paris by St. Louis in 1260. The first in Britain was commenced at Dublin in 1787, next in Liverpool in 1791. Others have been built in the large cities of Great Britain and all the principal cities of the United States; these the intellectual and industrial education of the blind has been very carefully attended

II. Technically:

1. Carpentry, Upholstery, &c.: A sun-screen or shade for a window. Blinds are of two kinds—inside and outside.

Inside blinds: A window blind of the best style, technically called a roller window blind, is a sheet of cloth dependent from a roller, and is used so as to cover the glass of a window and prevent people outside from seeing what passes within. It also prevents bright sunlight from entering the room. A Venetian blind is a blind formed not of cloth, but of long thin laths of wood, tied together, and within certain limits movable; they are generally painted green. Other window blinds are made of wire gauze, perforated zinc, &c. There are also dwarf, spring, and other made blinds.

Outside blinds: The chief of these are Persian, Florentine, Venetian, and shutter blinds.

2. Fortif.: The same as BLINDAGE (fortif.) (q.v.). It is called also a bladed cover.

3. Saddlery: The same as BLINDERS (saddlery, q.v.).

blind'-nĕss, * blind'-nēsse, * blinde-nēsse, * blȳ nd-nēsse, * blȳ nd-nēs, s. [From A.S. blindness.]

1. Lit.: The state of being blind; temporary or permanent want of sight.

¶ Sometimes blindness exists from birth; at other times it is the result of disease at some period or other of life. It may be produced by the severer kinds of ophthalmia. Many soldiers of the British army which, on the 8th and 21st of March, 1801, fought the battles of Aboukir and Alexandria, were seized with ophthalmia while in Egypt, and on returning home communicated the disease to regiments which had never been in Africa. many in consequence lost their eyesight. Malignant small-pox can produce the same result; a large proportion of the blind men now in India were deprived of vision in this way. Patients become blind after fever, measles, hooping-cough, or convulsions, or through cataract, inflammation of some part of the delicate machinery of the eye, violence, accident, or the decay of the system produced by old age. [For the treatment of the blind, see BLIND (1), s.]

2. Fig.: Absence of intellectual perception, produced by ignorance, prejudice, passion, &c.

"Our feelings pervert our convictions by smiting us with intellectual blindness."—Bain: The Emotions and the Will (3rd ed.); The Emotions, ch. i., p. 25.

"It may be said there exists no limit to the blindness of interest and selfish habit . . ."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (ed. 1870), ch. ii., p. 25.

blink, * blincke, * blenk, v.i. & t. [Of obscure origin. Blenk is the oldest form, of which blenk was an early occasional variant. Blink corresponds in its late appearance (c. 1575) as well as in form and sense with Mod. Dut. blinken and Ger. blinken, which are equally obscure. It is conjectured that they nasalized forms of the stem blik = to shine, but their late appearance is not accounted for. (N.E.D.)]

A. Intransitive:

I. To shine, to glitter, to twinkle.

1. Gen. Of the sun or anything luminous, whether by inherent or reflected light: To shine, especially to do so for a brief period and then withdraw the light

"When seven years were come and gane,
The sun blinked fair on pool and stream."
Scott: Thomas the Rhymer, pt. ii

2. Spec. Of the eye:

(1) Lit.: To give the eye the twinkling motion of anything glittering

(a) To wink designedly or unintentionally through weakness of eyes

"So politick, as if one eye
Upon the other were a spy;
That, to trepan the one to think
The other blind, both strove to blink."
Hudibras.

"His figure such as might his soul proclaim,
One eye was blinking, and one leg was lame."
Pope: Hom. Iliad, x. 1.

(b) To open the eyes, as one does from a slumber.

"The king wp blenkit hastily."
Barbour, viii. 208, MS

(c) To take a momentary glance, even though the eye does not wink in doing so.

¶ Johnson interprets blink in the example quoted as meaning, to see obscurely.

"Blenk in this mirrour, man, and mend;
For heir thou may thy exempill see."
Poems, 16th Cent., p. 213.

"Sweet and lovely wall, Show me thy chink, to blink through with mine eyne."
Shakesp. Mid. Night's Dream, v. 1.

(2) Fig.: To look with a favourable eye.

"All would go well if it might please God to blink upon Scotland, to remove the three plagues that we bear continue there, . . ."—Baillie: Lett., ii. 117 (Jamieson.)

II. To become a little sour. (Used of milk. In Scotch phrase bleezed [BLEEZE]. It probably meant originally turned sour by a blink or gleam of lightning, or, it may be, bewitched by the wink of some evil eye.) [B. 2.]

"I canna tell you fat was the matter wi't (the ale), gin the wort was blinkit, . . ."—Journal from London, p. 3. (Jamieson.)

B. Transitive:

1. Purposely to avoid seeing, or at least attending to, a particular thing, as if by winking at the moment when it was presented for observation, as "to blink a fact."

2. To bewitch, to dim. (See example under blinked.) blĭnk, * blȳnke, * blȳnck, * blenk, s. & a. [From blink, v. (q.v.). In Sw. & Dan. blink, s. = a twinkling, glimpse, beam, glance, or sparkle.]

A. As substantive:

I. Literally:

1. Gen.: A ray, rays, or sparkle of light.

(1) A momentary glimpse or gleam of light directly emitted by a fire, a candle, or other luminous body, or reflected from any surface.

"Of drawin swerdis scleuting to and fra
The bricht usetteil, and vthir armour fere Quharon the sun blenkit bytis clere."
Doug.: Virgil, 226, 8.

"Gi'e me the blink o' a candle."—Jamieson.

(2) The reflection of light, not necessarily temporary, from the surface of a body.

¶ † Blink of the ice. Among Greenland whalers, Arctic navigators, &c.: That dazzling whiteness about the horizon, which is occasioned by the reflection of light from fields of ice. It is now more generally called the ice-blink (q.v.). (Falconer.)

2. Spec.: The act of winking, a wink, or sudden glance of the eye, whether unintentionally or as a signal to some other person.

"The amorous blynckis flee to and fro."
Turberville: The Lover obtaining his wish.

"But trow ye that Sir Arthur's command could forbid the gibe o' the tongue or the blink o' the e'e, or gar them gie me my food wi' the look o' kindness that gars it digest ane weel . . ."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xii

II. Figuratively:

1. Of time:

(1) A very brief period of time, taking only about as long as the twinkling of an eye; a "twinkling."

"For nineteen days and nineteen nights,
Of sun, or moon, or midnight stern
Auld Durie never saw a blink,
The lodging was sae dark and dern."
Minstrelsy of the Border, iii. 116.

(2) A short period, but by no means so brief as that indicated under II. (1).

"A blenk, or blink, a twinkling of fair weather."—Sir J. Sinclair, p. 112.

"Since human life is out a blink, Why should we then its short joys sink."
Ramsay: Poems, ii. 377.

2. Of space: A short distance, a little way, such as may be passed over in a "blink" of time.

"There cam' a fiddler out o' Fife,
A blink beyond Balweary, &c."
Jacobite Relics, i. 21. (Jamieson.)

3. Of mental action or emotion: A spiritual glance.

". . . soul-refreshing blinks of the Gospel, . . ."—Walker: Remark. Passages, p. 85.

4. Of the Divine favour, or of worldly advantage bestowed:

(a) A glance of loving favour from God.

(b) A gleam of prosperity during adversity.

"By this blink of fair weather in such a storme of forrain assaults, things were again somewhat changed, and the Brucians encouraged."—Burnet: Hist. Dung., p. 69.

III. Abnormally (always in the plural, blinks): Boughs of trees used to barricade a path in a forest along which deer are expected to pass. (Crabb.) [Comp. BLENCHER.]

B. As adjective: Blinking. [BLINK-EYED.]

blink-beer, s. Beer kept unbroached until it is sharp.

blink-eyed, a. Having winking eyes.

". . . the foolish blink-eyed boys."—Gascoigne: Hearbes.

 blist, pa. par. & a. [BLISS.]

blis'-tẽr, * blis-tre, s. & a. [From O. Dut. bluister = blister. In Sw blåsa = a bladder, a blister, from blåsa; Icel. blása = to blow. Skeat considers blister practically a diminutive of the word blast, in the sense of swelling or blowing up. To a certain extent cognate also with Sw. blodbra; Dan. blære; Dut. blaar, all = blister; and with Eng. bladder (q.v.).]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally. (Borrowed from the medical and pharmaceutical uses of the word):

(1) A vesication on the human body or on the body of an animal. [II. 1.]

"In this state she gallops, night by night,
O'er ladies' lips, who straight on kisses dream,
Which oft the angry Mab with blisters plagues, Because their breaths with sweetmeats tainted are."
Shakesp.: Rom. & Jul. i. 4.

"I found a great blister drawn by the garlick, but had it cut, which ran a good deal of water, but filled again by next night."—Temple.

(2) An appliance for producing it. [II. 2.]

2. Fig.: Anything resembling a vesication on a plant, on a painted surface, on iron, or anything else. [II. 3.]

II. Technically:

1. Med.: A vesication produced upon the skin by an external irritating application, or by the friction of something hard. But the special use of the term is for a vesication produced intentionally for medical purposes by the application of a blister-plaster, of which the virtue consists in the powdered "Spanish" or "blister" flies scattered over the surface [2]. When this is first placed upon the skin there arises a sense of tingling and heat, followed by redness and pain, after which the cuticle rises into a vesicle or bladder filled with a watery fluid like the serum of the blood. On the puncturing of the bladder this at once escapes. In a few days the destroyed cuticle has its place supplied by new skin. Such blisters by attracting blood to them tend to withdraw it from morbidly gorged internal organs in a state of inflammation, besides setting up a second morbid action of which the tendency is to counterwork the first, with great relief to the system. [BLEB, PEMPHIGUS, VESICATION.]

2. Pharm.: A vesicatory designed to act upon the skin. It is generally made of the Spanish or blister-fly [BLISTER-FLY] powdered, mixed with lard and wax; the whole spread upon leather. It is commonly applied to the skin of the patient for ten or twelve hours.

3. Bot.: A morbid swelling like a vesication in a leaf, produced by the puncture or excavation of insects, or by any other cause.

"Upon the leaves there riseth a tumour like a blister."—Bacon.

B. As adjective: Producing vesications on the skin, as BLISTER-BEETLE (q.v.).

blister-beetle, s. The same as BLISTER-FLY (q.v.)

blister-fly, s. The name for any "fly," using that term in its widest sense to designate any flying insect. The more common blister-flies are beetles, and they are in consequence sometimes called blister-beetles. That most frequently employed by medical men for raising blisters on the skin is the Lytta vesicatoria, formerly called Cantharis vesicatorius. It feeds on the ash. It is indigenous in the South of Europe, and being among other places imported from Spain, is often called the Spanish-fly. [BLISTER-BEETLE, CANTHARIS, LYTTA, SPANISH-FLY.]

blister-plaster, s. A plaster medically prescribed to blister the skin. [BLISTER, II. 2, Pharm.] blister-steel, s.

Iron-working: Steel of blistered appearance formed by roasting bar-iron in contact with carbon in a cementing furnace. Two subsequent processes convert it into shear-steel and cast-steel (q.v.).

blis'-tẽr, v.t. & i. [From blister, s. (q.v.).]

A. Intrans.: To rise in vesications

"If I prove honeymouth, let my tongue blister,
And never to my red-look'd anger be
The trumpet any more."
Shakesp.: Wint. Tale, ii. 3.

B. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) To raise vesications on the skin, unintentionally, by burning; designedly, for medical purposes; or in any other way.

"I blistered the legs and thighs, but was too late; he died howling."—Wiseman.

(2) To raise small swellings like vesications on a plant.

" . . . that no part of them [grafts] be seene either scorched drie with the sunne, or cicatrised (as it were) and blistered."—Holland Pliny, bk. xvii., ch. 14.

2. Fig.: To injure, as the reputation, &c.; to annoy, irritate the temper, as a blister acts on the skin.

"Look, here comes one: a gentlewoman of mine,
Who, falling in the flaws of her own youth,
Hath blister'd her report."
Shakesp.: Meas for Meas., iii. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Med. & Phar.: To produce vesications on the skin by means of a blister-plaster, or in any similar way. [BLISTER, s., A. II.]

2. Bot. [BLISTERED. See also I., 1. (2).]

blis'-tẽred, pa. par. & a. [BLISTER, v.t.]

I. Ord. Lang.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

II. Bot.: Having the surface raised, so as to resemble the elevations on the blistered skin of an animal.

blis'-tẽr-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [BLISTER, v.]

A. & B. As present participle & participial adjective: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As substantive: The act of raising vesications on the skin; the state of having them raised upon one's skin.

"Blistering, cupping, bleeding are seldom of use but to the idle and intemperate."—Spectator, No. 195.

blis'-tẽr-wòrt, s. [Eng. blister; wort.] A plant—the Celery-leaved Crowfoot (Ranunculus sceleratus). (Lyte.)

† blis'-tẽr-ỳ, a. [Eng. blister; -y.] All covered with blisters. (Webster.) blithe, * blỹthe, * bliþ, * blyth, a. [A.S. blithe = (1) joyful, (2) single, simple, kind, (3) luxurious, lascivious; Icel. blidhr; Sw, blid = mild, propitious; Dan. blid = cheerful, gay; Dut. blij, blyd, blyde = joyful, cheerful; O. H. Ger. blidhi = glad; Mœso-Goth. bleiths = merciful, kind.]

1. Of persons, or, indeed, of any sentient being: Gay, cheerful, joyous, merry, mirthful.

(a) Of the human countenance.

"We have always one eye fixed upon the countenance of our enemies: and, according to the blithe or heavy aspect thereof, our other eye showeth some other suitable token either of dislike or approbation."—Hooker: Eccl. Pol., bk. iv., ch. ix., § 3.

(b) Of man's thoughts, feelings, or demeanour.

"Stole in among the morning's blither thoughts."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. 2.

(c) Of the lower animals:

"To whom the wily adder, blithe and glad, Empress! the way is ready, and not long."
Milton P. L., bk ix.

2. Of things: Exciting, attended by, or associated with gaiety, cheerfulness, joy, or mirth.

"And the New-year blithe and bold, my friend."
Tennyson The Death of the Old Year.

¶ An old poet uses it for the adverb blithely.

"Than doth the nyghtyngale hir mynght
To make noyse, and syngen blythe
The Romaunt of the Rose.

blithe, blythe (O. Scotch), bli-then, bly-then (O. Eng.), v.t. [Compare A.S. blithsian = to be blithe or glad; from A.S. blithe.] [BLITHE.] To gladden. (Prompt. Parv.)

II. Technically:

1. Mech.: A pulley, or a system of pulleys rotating on a pintle mounted in its frame or shell with its band and strap. The pin or pintle of a block of pulleys is the axis or axle. It passes through the bushing of the shell and the cask of the sheave, and is generally of iron. The sheave or wheel is generally of lignum-vitæ or of iron, and has around its circumference a groove for the rope, called the gorge. It has a bushing, called a cask, around the pintle hole. The space between the sheave and its block, through which the rope runs, is called the scullor or channel. It answers to the throat of some other machines, the pass in a rolling-mill. The shell, pulley frame, or body of the block is made of a tough wood, or sometimes of iron: it has one or two grooves, called scores, cut on each end to retain the strap which goes around it. The shell is hollow inside to receive the sheave or sheaves, and has a hole through its centre to receive the sheave-pin, called the pintle; this is lined with bronze or gun-metal, called a bushing or bushing. When the shell is made of one piece, it is called a mortise-block; when more than one are employed, it is termed a made block. The side plates of the shell are cheeks. The strap, strop, iron-binding, grommet, or cringle, is a loop of iron or rope, encircling the block, and affords the means of fastening it in its place. The hook of iron-strapped blocks is frequently made to work in a swivel, so that the several parts of the rope forming the tackle may not become "foul" or twisted around each other. (Knight.)

There are many kinds of blocks, as a pulley-block, a fiddle-block, a fish-block, a fly-block, a heart-block, a hook block, &c. See these words.

* Block and tackle: The block and the rope rove through it, for hoisting or obtaining a purchase. (TACKLE.)

2. Sawyers' work: One of the frames on which an end of a log rests in a saw-mill.

3. Carp.: A square piece of wood fitted in the re-entering angle formed by the meeting edges of two pieces of board. The blocks are glued at the rear and strengthen the joint. (Knight.)

4. Wood-cutting: A form made of hard wood, on which figures are cut in relief by means of knives, chisels, &c.

5. Hat-making: A cylinder of wood over which a hat or bonnet is shaped in the process of manufacture.

6. Saddlery: A former or block on which a piece of wet leather is moulded by hammering or pressure.

7. Military:

(a) Short pieces of scantling, used for elevating cannon and supporting them in position a short distance from the ground, or in assisting in their transfer from higher to lower levels, and reversed. These are designated as whole, half, and quarter blocks, and have a uniform breadth of twenty and width of eight inches, the respective thickness being eight, four, and two inches. (Knight.)

(b) The term is used also as part of the compound gun-blocks (q.v.).

8. Falconry: The perch on which a bird of prey is kept.

9. Cricket: The spot where the striker places his bat to guard his wicket; also called block-hole. [GUARD.]

10. Hairdressing: A barber's block = a stand for a wig.

B. As adjective: Pertaining to or resembling a short, thick, lump of wood or other material. (See the compounds which follow.)

Printing: A book printed not from movable types, but from engraved blocks, each one forming a page. Block-printing had long been known [BLOCK-PRINTING] before the art was used in the preparation of books. In 1438 Lourenz John Koster of Haarlem published his Speculum Humanæ Salvationis with blocks; the Biblia Pauperum, published early in the fifteenth century, was also a block-book. About 1450 movable types began to be used, and block-books were superseded. [PRINTING.]

block-brush, s. [So named because used by butchers to clean their blocks.]

Bot.: A bunch of the plant called Butcher's Broom (Ruscus aculeatus). It is borne by butchers in the insignia of their company.

Printing: Type of large size cut out of wooden blocks. Block-letters, or wooden type, are generally made of cherry, cut endwise. They are made of sizes from two or three-line pica up to 150-line pica, more than two feet in length.

block-letter cutting-machine, s. A machine for cutting block-letters. (For various forms of them see Knight's Practical Dictionary of Mechanics.) block-machinery, block machinery, s.

Mech.: Machinery for cutting, shaping and adjusting the "blocks" to be associated with "tackles" in the navy and in merchant vessels. In A.D 1781, Mr. Walter Taylor of Southampton took out a patent for such machinery, and from his works on the Itchen supplied the navy with all the blocks it required for more than twenty years. About the beginning of the present century, Mr., afterwards Sir Mark Isambart Brunel, constructed an improved machine, or rather series of machines, for block-cutting, mortising, shaping, scoring, drilling, &c., which being adopted by the government, led to their becoming their own block manufacturers at Portsmouth, and turning out the most beautifully-made and adjusted articles in numbers amply sufficient to supply the whole navy, without assistance from any private firm. The machines used for dressing the shells of the blocks are (1) a reciprocating cross saw, (2) a circular cross-cut saw (3) a reciprocating ripping saw, (4) a boring-machine, (5) a mortising-machine, (6) a corner-saw, (7) a sharping machine, and (8) a scoring-machine. A reciprocating, a circular, and a cross saw are used for rounding the sheaves and boring the centre hole. There are, besides, a coaling-machine, a drilling-machine, a riveting-machine, and a facing-lathe.

Printing: The art or process of printing from blocks instead of from movable types. It is supposed to have been invented by the Chinese about A.D. 593. It has been long employed in calico-printing in that country, as well as in India, Arabia, and Egypt. In Europe the same process was adopted for printing playing-cards, and during the first half of the fifteenth century books were produced by means of block-printing; they were hence called block-books. [BLOCK-BOOK.] Now block-printing is used for printing cotton cloth or paper for hangings. Two stages of progress in the method are to be traced. First the pattern was dabbed upon the colour and impressed by hand upon the material, which lay upon a table before the workman. When the pattern was in several colours, different blocks of the same size were employed, the raised pattern in each being adapted for its special portion of the design. The exact correspondence of each part, as to position, was secured by pins on the blocks, which pierced small holes in the material and indicated the exact position. Next, an improved system by Perrot was introduced, in which the calico passed between a square prism and three engraved blocks, brought in apposition to three faces of the prism, and delivered their separate impressions thereupon in succession. Each block was inked after each impression, and the cloth was drawn through by a winding cylinder. The blocks were pressed against the cloth by springs. Perrot's system did twenty times as much work in an hour as that which it all but displaced. Now block-printing has been superseded by cylinder or roller-printing, which works twenty times as fast as even Perrot's method. (Knight.)

Railway Travelling: A method of signalling specially designed to prevent collisions between trains travelling on the same line of rails. The route to be traversed is divided into small sections by telegraph boxes erected at intervals. Let A D in the fig. be a portion of such a line with signal-boxes at A, B, C, and D. Let t' and t be two trains both moving in the direction of the arrows. If t' overtake t there will be a collision, but the block-system prevents this by setting the danger-signal at B against the train t' till t has passed C. Then the danger-signal is set at C against train t' till t has passed D, and so in succession. If the system is properly worked two trains are never for a moment in the same section of the railway, and cannot therefore come into collision.

Dentistry: Two or more teeth made in a block carved by hand.

block-tin, s. [Eng. block, and tin. In Sw. blocktenn; Dut. blokt'in; Ger. blockzinn.]

Comm.: A name given to an impure tin cast into ingots. When the metal is allowed to cool gradually the upper part is the purest, the impurities being contained in the lower part. Block-tin contains iron, arsenic, lead, &c. [TIN.]

block-wood, blockwood, s. An unknown wood, presumably suitable for being carved into blocks.

"Blockwood, logwood, and other forbidden materials. . . ."—Golden Fleece (1657). (Halliwell. Cont. to Lazenby.) blŏck, v.t. [From Eng. block, s. (q.v.). In Sw. blockera, blockera; Dan. blokere = to block up; Dut. blokkeren; Ger. blockiren; Fr. bloquer; Sp. & Port. bloquear; Ital. bloccare.]

I. Literally:

(1) To shut up so as to hinder egress or ingress; to obstruct. (Dryden: Spanish Friar, v. 1.) (Often followed by up.)

(2) To block a bill in Parliament is to give notice of opposition and so to bring it within the operation of the Standing Order, which, subject to certain exceptions, provides that "no order of the day or notice of motion be taken after half-past twelve at night, with respect to which order or notice of motion a notice of opposition shall have been printed on the notice paper."

* In Cricket: To stop a ball dead without attempting to hit it.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To plan, to devise. (Scotch.) [¶ (2).]

"The committee appointed for the first blocking of all our writs."—Baillie: Letters, i. 75.

(2) To bargain. (Scotch.)

"After that he had long tyme blockit,
With grit difficultie he tulk thairto."
Leg. Bp. St. Andreas Poems, 16th cent., p. 334. (Jamieson.)

¶ (1) To block in:

Art: To get in the broad masses of a picture or drawing.

(2) To block out: Roughly to mark out work afterwards to be done.

blŏc-kāde', s. [From Eng. block; and suffix -ade. In Sw. blockad; Dan. blokade; Dut. blokkade; Ger. blockade; Fr. blocus (a contraction, according to Littré, of Ger. blockhaus; O. Ger. block hûs) = a blockade; Sp. bloqueo; Port. bloqueio; Ital. bloccatura.]

I. Mil., Naut., & Gen. Language:

1. Gen.: The act of surrounding a town with a hostile army, or, if it be on the sea-coast, of placing a hostile army around its landward side, and ships of war in front of its sea defences, so as if possible to prevent supplies of food and ammunition from entering it by land or water. The object of such an investment is to compel a place too strong or too well defended to be at once captured by assault, to surrender on account of famine.

"It seemed that the siege must be turned into a blockade."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

¶ Almost every siege involves a blockade, but in a siege, properly so called, military approaches are pushed on against the place with the view of ultimately capturing it by assault, whereas in a blockade no assault is contemplated. Most of the sieges of antiquity were only blockades.

2. Spec.: The investment of a place by sea, to prevent any ships from entering or leaving its harbour. The practice seems to have been introduced by the Dutch about A.D. 1584.

¶ (1) To break a blockade: Forcibly to enter a blockaded port, if not even to compel the naval force investing it to withdraw.

(2) To raise a blockade:

(a) To desist from blockading a place.

(b) To compel the investing force to do so.

(3) To run a blockade: Surreptitiously to enter or leave a blockaded port at the risk of being captured.

II. International Maritime Law: As a blockade seriously interferes with the ordinary commercial right of trading with every place, international law carefully limits its operation, the principle adopted being this: that belligerents are not entitled to do anything likely to incommode neutrals more than it benefits themselves. Neutrals are therefore entitled to disregard a blockade except it be effective, that is, unless the town be invested by a fleet sufficient to prevent the ingress and the exit of vessels. When on the 21st November, 1806, the Berlin decree of Napoleon I. declared the whole British Islands in a state of blockade, that blockade, being ludicrously ineffective, was illegal; so also, though to a somewhat less extent, were the British orders in Council of the 11th and 21st November, 1807, which placed France and all its tributary states in a state of blockade. The retaliatory Napoleonic Milan decree of 27th December, 1807, extending the previously announced blockade to the British dominions in all quarters, laboured to a still greater extent under the same defect. More effective, as being more limited in area, were the blockades of the Elbe by Britain in 1803, that of the Baltic by Denmark in 1848–9 and 1864, and that of the ports of the Confederate States of America by President Lincoln on April 19, 1861. A blockade should be formally notified before it is enforced, permission being granted to neutral vessels then to depart, carrying with them any cargo which they may already have on board; when it terminates, its cessation should also be formally declared. Any one running a blockade does so at his own peril; one's own government cannot by international law protect him from forfeiting his vessel with its cargo and his liberty, if he be captured by the blockading fleet.

1. Of things: A vessel used for the purpose of trading by sea with a blockaded town.

†2. Of persons: A man engaged in trading by sea with a blockaded town.

blockade-running, s. The art or occupation of trading by sea with a blockaded town. During the American Civil War of 1861–1865, many of the British engaged in blockade-running, attempting to enter Richmond and other harbours of the Confederate States.

blŏc-kā'de, v.t. [From blockade, s. (q.v.). See also Block, v.]

1. Ord. Lang., Military, &c.: To surround a town with troops, or, if it be a seaport, to surround its landward portion with troops, and place ships of war in front of its harbour, so as to cut off all supplies from the garrison and inhabitants till they surrender the place.

". . . the approaches were closed, and the town effectually blockaded."—Froude: Hist. Eng. (1858), vol. iv. [illegible]

2. Fig.: To obstruct the passage to anything. Sometimes ludicrously.

"Huge bales of British cloth blockade the door,
A hundred oxen at your levee roar" Pope: Mor. Essays, iii. 57.

blŏcked, pa. par. & a. [Block.]

 blŏck'-ĕr, * blŏk'-ĕr, s. [Eng. block; -er.]

1. One who hinders the progress of anything, an obstructive; specif., one who blocks a parliamentary bill.

2. One who plans or accomplishes a bargain; a broker. (Scotch.)

"Oure soverane Lord, &c., understanding of the fraude and frequent abuse committed by many of his Majesties subjectis, byeris and blokeris of victuall."—Acts Ja. VI., 1621 ed. 1644, p. 614. (Jamieson.) blŏck'-hĕad, s. [Eng. block; head.] A person, with a good deal of exaggeration, said to be as destitute of understanding as if his skull enclosed a block of wood in place of hemispheres of brain; a dolt, a fool, an ass, a stupid person.

"The Christian hope is—Waiter, draw the cork—
If I mistake not—Blockhead! with a fork."
Cowper: Hope.

blŏck'-hĕad-ĕd, a. [Eng. blockhead; -ed.] Having such a mind as is possessed by a blockhead; stupid, dull.

"Says a blockheaded boy, these are villainous creatures."—L'Estrange.

blŏck'-hĕad-ism, s. [Eng. blockhead; -ism.] The procedure or characteristics of a blockhead.

". . . though now reduced to that state of blockheadism."—Smart: Notes to the Hilliad.

blŏck'-hĕad-ly, a. [Eng. blockhead; -ly.] Like a blockhead.

"Some mere elder-brother, or some blockheadly hero."—Dryden: Amphitryon.

blŏck'-hŏuse, † blŏck'-haus (au as ŏŏ), s. [Eng. block = a thick, heavy mass of wood, and house. In Sw. blockhus; Dan. blockhaus; Dut. blokhuis; Ger. & Fr. blockhaus.]

Fortif. & Ord. Lang.: A small fort built of heavy timber or logs, and with the sides loop-holed for musketry, or if it be sufficiently large and strong, with ports or embrasures for cannon. It may be built square, rectangular, polygonal, or in the form of a cross. If more than one storey high the upper storey may project over the lower so as to obtain a fire directly downwards. It is generally surrounded by a ditch, and sometimes has earth on its roof that it may be more difficult to set it on fire.

"But, when they had passed both frigate and block-house without being challenged, their spirits rose."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

blŏck'-in-cōurse, s. & a. [Eng. block; in; course.] A term used only in the subjoined compounds.

Masonry: A kind of masonry which differs from ashlar masonry chiefly in being built of smaller stones. The usual depth of a course is from seven to nine inches.

blŏck'-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [Block, v.]

A. & B. As present participle and participial adjective: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language: The act of shutting up or obstructing; the state of being shut up or obstructed; obstruction. [Block, v. ¶ 2.]

". . . by blocking of trade . . ."—Clarendon.

II. Technically:

1. Leather-working: The process of bending leather for boot-fronts to the required shape. [Crimping.]

2. Bookbinding: The art of impressing a pattern on a book-cover by a plate or assemblation of tools under pressure. It is called blind or gold blocking. In the latter case, gold-leaf is used; in the former, the bare block.

3. Carpentry: A mode of securing together the vertical angles of wood-work. Blocks of wood are glued in the inside angle.

blocking-course, s.

Architecture: The upper course of stones or brick above a cornice or on the top of a wall.

blocking-down, s.

Metallurgy: The art of adjusting sheet-metal to a mould or shape. This is done by laying above it a thick piece of lead, and striking the latter by a mallet or hammer. This mode is sometimes adopted to bring a plate partially to shape before swagging it between the dies. (Knight.) blocking-kettle, s.

Hat-making: A hot bath in which hats are softened in the process of manufacture, so as to be drawn over blocks. (Knight.) blocking-press, s.

Bookbinding: A bookbinder's screw-press in which blocking is performed. It has less power than the embossing-press, which operates with large dies, being used for ornamentation, requiring but a comparatively small pressure. The die is adjusted in the upper bed or plate, and is heated by means of gas-jets coming down through a cavity at its back. The book-covers are introduced seriatim upon the lower bed by the operator, who by a turn of the handle brings the upper bed down with a gentle and equable pressure, fixing the gold-leaf, when this is employed, upon the surface previously prepared for the purpose. A boy, who assists, removes the superfluous portions with a rag, which becomes thoroughly saturated with the precious metal in the course of use, and is sold to the refiners. (Knight.) blŏck'-ish, a. [Eng. block; -ish.]

1. Of the nature of a block.

2. Stupid, dull, wanting in intellect.

"Make a lottery;
And, by device, let blockish Ajax draw
The sort to fight with Hector."
Shakesp.: Troil. & Cressid., i. 3.

3. Rude, clumsy.

"The forms of our thought [would be] blockish."—Grant White: Every-day English, p. 296.

blŏck'-ish-ly, adv. [Eng. blockish; -ly.] In a blockish manner, stupidly, with dehcient intellect.

"These brave doctors fail most absurdly and blockishly in this so necessary an article."—Burmar: Trans. of Bess a Sierra, p. 426.

blŏck'-ish-nĕss, s. [Eng. blockish; -ness.] The quality of being blockish, stupidity.

"Being dull, and of incurable blockishness, he became a hater of virtue and learning."—Whitlock: Nat. of the Eng., p. 190.

blŏck'-like, a. [Eng. block; -like.] Like a block, stupid.

"Am I twice sand-blind? twice so near the blessing
I would arrive at, and blocklike never know it!"
Beaum. & Fl.: Pilgrim.

 blod, * blode, s. [Blood.]

1. A child.

"And vche blod on that burne blessed schal worthe."
E. Eng. Allit. Poems (ed. Morris), Cleanness, xvi.

2. A living being.

"A thusaunt platee of silver god Gef he sarra that faire blod."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 1191, 1192.

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally: The fluid circulating by means of veins and arteries through the bodies of man and of the lower animals. [II. 1.]

"For the life of the flesh is in the blood and I have given it to you upon the altar."—Lev. xvii. 11.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Lineage, descent, progeny.

(a) Of things: Lineage, descent; specially royal or noble descent, high extraction.

"O what an happiness is it to find A friend of our own blood, a brother kind!"
Waller.

¶ Formerly it might in this sense have a plural.

"As many, and as well-born bloods as those, Stand in his face to contradict his claim."
Shakesp.: King John, ii. 1.

†(b) Of persons: Child, progeny. (In this sense generally combined with flesh.)

"But yet thou art my flesh, my blood, my daughter."
Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 4.

¶ A half-blood: A half-breed.

(2) Temper, passions; or one in whom these are prominent.

(a) Of things: Temper, passions.

"The Puritan blood was now thoroughly up."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

(b) Of persons: A person of hot temper; a man (in most cases young) of fiery character; one brave, but unrestrained by prudence or perhaps even by moral principle, and from whom in consequence violence may in times of excitement be expected.

"The news put divers young bloods into such a fury as the ambassadors were not without peril to be outraged."—Bacon.

(3) Life; the vital principle, especially with reference to the taking away of life. Hence closely allied to (4).

"Shall I not therefore now require his blood of your hands?"—2 Sam. iv. 11.

(4) The shedding of blood or its consequences.

(a) The shedding of blood; the taking of life away, especially in an unlawful manner; murder.

"Blood follows blood, and through their mortal span,
In bloodier acts conclude those who with blood began."
Byron: Childe Harold, ii. 63.

(b) The atoning death of Christ.

". . . the blood of Jesus Christ his son cleanseth us from all sin."—1 John i. 7.

(c) The responsibility of shedding blood, sacrificing a life, or the soul.

"Your blood be upon your own heads . . ."—Acts xviii. 6.

¶ The price of blood: Reward or retribution for shedding it, or for taking a life.

"It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood."—Matt. xxvii. 6.

(5) Any liquid resembling blood in colour, or in some other obvious character. (Used especially of the juice of a fruit as the grape.)

". . . and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape."—Deut. xxxii. 14.

¶ With some similitude to this, the wine in the communion is the sacramental symbol of the blood of Christ.

"And he said unto them, This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many."—Mark xiv. 24.

3. In special phrases, the word blood having the same signification:

(1) As in A. I. 1.

Flesh and blood: Human nature. [Flesh.]

". . . for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."—Matt xvi. 17.

(2) As in A. I. 2. (a).

(a) A prince of the blood: A prince of royal extraction, not one raised to the dignity of prince by law or mandate.

"They will almost
Give us a prince of th' blood, a son of Priam,
In change of him."
Shakesp.: Troil. & Cress., iii. 3.

(b) The blood-royal: Royal descent.

(3) As in A. I. 2. (2).

(a) Bad blood: A feeling of animosity towards one.

(b) In cold blood: With the passions unexcited, coolly, and therefore, presumably, with more or less deliberation.

"Who cannot condemn rashness in cold blood?"
Shakesp. Timon, iii. 5.

(c) In hot blood: With the passions excited.

"Upon a friend of mine, who, in hot blood, Hath stepp'd into the law."
Shakesp.: Timon, iii. 5.

(4) As in A. I. 2 (3).

* For his blood: Though his life depended upon it. (Vulgar.)

"A crow lay battering upon a muscle, and could not, for his blood, break the shell to come at the fish.—L'Estrange.

II. Technically:

1. Physiol.: The red circulating fluid in the bodies of man and the higher animals. It is formed from chyle and lymph when these substances are subjected to the action of oxygen taken into the lungs by the process of inspiration. It is the general material from which all the secretions are derived, besides which it carries away from the frame whatever is noxious or superfluous. In man its temperature rarely varies from 36·6° C = 98° F., but in birds it sometimes reaches 42·8 C = 109° F. The blood in reptiles, amphibia, and fishes, and the circulating fluid in the invertebrata, is cold, that is, in no case more than a little above the temperature of the surrounding medium. The vessels which conduct the blood out from the heart are called arteries, and those which bring it back again veins. The blood in the left-hand side of the heart and in the arteries, called arterial blood, is bright red; that in the right side of the heart and in the veins, called venous blood, is blackish-purple. Viewed by spectrum analysis, the hæmoglobin of arterial blood differs from that of venous blood, the former being combined with oxygen, and the latter being deoxidised. The film of the two also differs, besides which carbonic acid predominates in the gaseous matter held in solution in the former, and free oxygen in the latter. The density of blood is 1·063 to 1·057. Its composition in 1,000 parts is as follows:—

Blood has a saline and disagreeable taste, and when fresh, a peculiar smell. It has an alkaline re-action. It is not, as it appears, homogeneous, but under a powerful microscope is seen to be a colourless fluid with little round red bodies called blood-discs or blood-corpuscles, and a few larger ones called white-corpuscles floating about in it. [Blood-disc, Corpuscle.] When removed from the body and allowed to stagnate it separates into a thicker portion called crasor, crassamentum, or clot, and a thinner one denominated serum. [See these words.]

"The blood is the immediate pabulum of the tissues; its composition is nearly or entirely identical with them; it is, indeed as Borden long ago expressed it, liquid flesh."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., i. 63.

2. Law:

(1) Whole blood is descent not simply from the same ancestor, but from the same pair of ancestors, whilst half blood is descent only from the one. Thus in a family two brothers who have the same father and mother stand to each other in the relation of whole blood, but if the mother die, and the father marry again and have children, these stand to the offspring of the first marriage only in the relation of half blood. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. xiv.)

"According to the common law of England, in administrations, the whole blood is preferred to the half blood."—Ayliffe.

(2) Corruption of blood is the judicial stripping it of the right to carry with it up or down the advantage of inheritance [Attainder]; its purification or restitution is in it the restoration to it of the privilege of inheritance. (Ibid., ch. xv., bk. iv., ch. 29, 31.)

(5) The Common Yarrow or Milfoil (Achillea millefolium.) (Britten & Holland.)

2. Of foreign plants: Sanguinaria canadensis, one of the Papaveraceæ (Poppyworts). The English name is given because the plant when wounded in any part discharges a blood-red fluid. The root is tuberous and fleshy; there is but one leaf from each root-bulb, and one scape with a solitary flower, which is very fugacious. It is abundant in the backwoods of Canada, where the Indians stain themselves with the juice.

¶ Burnet Bloodwort. [Burnet.]

blóod'-ỹ (1), * bloud'-dy, * bloud-ie, * blod'-y, * blod-ye, * blôdi (Eng.), blóod-ỹ, * blúd-ỹ (Scotch), a. & adv. [Eng. blood; -y; A.S. blōdig; Sw. & Dan. blodig; Dut. bloedig; Ger. blutig.]

Swift.

2. Fig.: Of anything.

". . . that I may destroy them, and blot out their name from under heaven."—Deut. ix. 14.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between to blot out, expunge, raze or erase, efface, cancel, and obliterate: "All these terms obviously refer to characters that are impressed on bodies; the first three apply in the proper sense only to that which is written with the hand, and bespeak the manner in which the action is performed. Letters are blotted out, so that they cannot be seen again; they are expunged, so as to signify that they cannot stand for anything; they are erased, so that the space may be re-occupied with writing. The last three are extended in their application to other characters formed on other substances: efface is general, and does not designate either the manner or the object; inscriptions on stone may be effaced, which are rubbed off so as not to be visible. Cancel is principally confined to written or printed characters; they are cancelled by striking through them with the pen; in this manner, leaves or pages of a book are cancelled which are no longer to be reckoned. Obliterate is said of all characters, but without defining the mode in which they are put out; letters are obliterated which are in any way made illegible. Efface applies to images, or the representations of things, in this manner the likeness of a person may be effaced from a statue. Cancel respects the subject which is written or printed; obliterate respects the single letters which constitute words. Effare is the consequence of some direct action on the thing which is effaced; in this manner writing may be effaced from a wall by the action of the elements. Cancel is the act of a person, and always the fruit of design. Obliterate is the fruit of accident and circumstances in general; time itself may obliterate characters on a wall or on paper." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) blŏt (2), v.t. [Probably from Dan. blot = bare, naked.] [BLOT (2), s.] To puzzle, to nonplus. (Scotch.) (Duff: Poems.)

blŏt'-tĕr, s. [From blot, v., and suff. -er.]

1. Gen.: One who blots or defiles.

"Thou [Christ] art the blotting of Thine image in Paradise as a blemish to Thyself, and Thou enlightest to the blotter. Because thou hast done it, on thy belly shalt thou creep."—Alp. Marmot, Serm. with Mount's Serm., 1646, p. 151.

2. That which does so. Specially, a device for absorbing the superfluous ink from paper after writing. The blotter may be merely a thin book interleaved with bibulous paper, or a pad or cushion covered with blotting-paper, and having a handle, being used after the manner of a stamp. Another form consists of a roller covered with successive layers of blotting-paper, and revolving on an axis, a handle being attached for convenient use. The layers of paper may be removed as they become soiled, and fresh paper substituted. (Knight.) blow (1), s. & a. [From blow, v. I.]

A. As adjective (chiefly in compos.):

1. Noting that through which blowing takes place. [BLOW-HOLE, BLOW-VALVE, &c.]

2. Inflated, or noting that by means of which inflation, swelling, or tumour takes place. [BLOW-BALL, BLOW-FLY.]

B. As substantive:

1. A blast, a gale of wind.

2. The spouting of a cetacean.

3. Chiefly in the plur.: The eggs or larvæ of a flesh fly as often seen in decaying carcases.

"I much fear, lest with the blows of flies His brass-inflicted wounds are filled."
Chapman: Iliad.

blow ball, s. [BLOWBALL.]

blow-fly, s. The name popularly given to such two-winged flies as deposit eggs in the flesh of animals. Several species of Musca do this, so do breeze-flies, &c. [BREEZE-FLY, MUSCA.]

blow gun, s. A gun for blowing arrows instead of impelling them by a bowstring. It is in use among the Barbados Indians of Brazil and the Malays of the Eastern Archipelago; men of the latter race call it sumpitan.

blow hole, s. A hole for blowing through.

Blow-holes of a whale: Two apertures on the top of the head in the more typical Cetacea, constituting the nostrils, through which spray is sometimes blown to a considerable height, with the violently expelled air. The appearance of a column of water, however, is generally due to the condensation of the expired air.

blow-milk, s. Milk from which cream has been blown. (Ogilvie.) blow-off cock, s. A faucet in a steam-boiler for allowing water to escape.

blow off pipe, s. A pipe at the lower part of a steam boiler by which at intervals sediment is driven out.

blow-out, s. A vulgar expression for a hearty meal.

blow-over, s.

Glass-manufacture: An arrangement in blowing glass bottles or jars in moulds in which the surplus glass is collected in a chamber above the lip of the vessel with but a thin connecting portion, so that the surplus is readily broken off without danger to the vessel itself. (Knight.) blow-through, a. Designed for allowing steam to pass through with noise.

Blow through Valve, Steam-engine: A valve commanding the opening through which boiler-steam is admitted to a condensing steam-engine to blow through and expel air and condensed water, which depart through the way of the snifting-valve. It is the first operation in starting an engine of this character, the condenser being then brought into operation to condense the vaporous contents of the cylinder and make the first stroke. (Knight.) blow-tube, s.

1. The hollow iron rod used by glass-makers to gather "metal" (melted glass) from the pots, to blow and form it into the desired shape, a jonty.

2. A tube through which arrows are driven by the breath. [BLOW-GUN.]

blow-up, a. Designed for allowing steam to blow up into.

Blow-up Pan, Sugar-machinery: A pan used in dissolving raw sugar preparatory to the process of refining. Steam is introduced by means of pipes coiled round within the vessels to dissolve the sugar, which thence becomes a dark, thick, viscous liquid; a small portion of lime-water is admitted to the sugar, and constant stirring with long slender rods assists the process of liquefaction. The blow-up pans are generally rectangular, six or seven feet long, three or four feet wide, and three feet deep, with perforated copper pipes near the bottom, through the holes of which steam is blown into the sugar. (Knight.) blow-valve, s.

Steam-engine: The valve by which the air expelled from the cylinder escapes from the condenser on the downward stroke of the piston when a steam-engine is first set in motion; the snifting-valve.

blow (2), s. [From Eng. blow (2), v. In Ger. id. the, blute.] A blossom.

¶ In blow: In flower, in blossom.

"The pineapples, in triple row,
Were basking hot, and all in blow."
Cowper: The Pineapple and the Bee blow (3), * blowe, s. [O. Dut. blauwe = a blow; (N. H.) Ger. blauen, blauen = to beat; M. H. Ger. biuwen; O. H. Ger. bliuwan, pliuwan; Moso-Goth. bliggwan = to kill, to murder. Skeat considers it cognate with Lat. flago = to strike or strike down, and flagellum = a whip, a scourge. Compare also Lat. plaga; Gr. πλαγή (plagē) = a blow, a stroke.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A stroke

(a) Gen.: In the foregoing sense.

"Hee [Sir J. Gates] ... then reioyning the kerchiefe layde downe his head which was stroken off at three blowes. —Stowe: Queen Mary, an 1553.

(b) Spec.: A fatal stroke; a stroke causing death.

"Assuage your thirst of blood, and strike the blow"
Dryden

(2) A series of strokes, fighting, war, assault; resistance by force of arms.

"... and that a vigorous blow might win it [Hannibal's camp] with all its spoil."—Arnold: Hist. Rome, vol. iii., ch. xliv., p. 227.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Anything which strikes the senses or the mind suddenly and calamitously, as reproachful language, sad intelligence, bereavement, loss of property, &c.

"A most poor man, made tame to fortune's blows."
Shakesp.: King Lear, iv. 6.

† (2) Sickness or other suffering divinely sent on one, even when there is no suddenness in the visitation.

"Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thine hand."—Ps. xxxix. 1.

(3) A stroke struck by the voice, the pen, or anything similar.

"A woman's tongue,
That gives not half so great a blow to th' ear,
As will a chestnut."
Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, i. 2.

¶ Special phrases:

(1) At a blow: As the result of one defeat; all in a moment

"Every year they gain a victory and a town, but if they are once defeated, they lose a province at a blow."
—Dryden.

(2) To come to blows.

(a) Of individuals: To pass from angry disputation to the use of the fists.

(b) Of nations: To cease diplomatic negotiation and send armies to fight.

† (3) To go to blows: Essentially the same as to come to blows, No. (2).

"... to prevent the House of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel from going to blows with the House of Brunswick Lunenburg." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

¶ Precise signification of blow: Crabb thus distinguishes between blow and stroke;—"Blow is used abstractedly to denote the effect of violence, stroke is employed relatively to the person producing that effect. A blow may be received by carelessness of the receiver, or by a pure accident; but strokes are dealt out according to the design of the giver. Children are always in the way of getting blows in the course of their play, and of receiving strokes by way of chastisement. A blow may be given with the hand or with any flat substance; a stroke is rather a long-drawn blow, given with a long instrument like a stick. Blows may be given with the flat part of a sword, and strokes with a stick. Blow is seldom used but in the proper sense; stroke sometimes figuratively, as 'a stroke of death,' or 'a stroke of fortune.'" (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

II. Naut.: A violent wind, a gale blow-ball, s. [From Eng. blow; and ball. It is called ball because the entire compound fruit of the plant when mature is globular like a ball, and the epithet blow is applied because children are accustomed to blow away portions of it to ascertain the hour of the day. If the whole sphere of balloons, each with a seed for its car, depart at the first vigorous puff of breath, it is, in childish estimate, one o'clock, if at two puffs two o'clock, and so forth.] The fruit of the Dandelion (Leontodon Taraxacum). [DANDELION, LEONTODON.]

"Her treating would not bend a blade of grass, Or shake the downy blow-ball from its stalk."
B. Jonson: Sad Sheph., i.

* blöw-ăn, pa. par. [BLOWN.]

blow-ĕr, s. [Eng. blow; -er.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of persons:

† (1) As a separate word: One who blows.

"Add his care and cost in buying wood, and in fetching the same to the blowing house, together with the blowers two of three months entrance and increasing labour." —Harvey

(2) In compos.: As a glass-blower, &c.

"... chief captaine and trompet blower ..."—Tyndall: Works, p. 5 (Parker Soc.)

2. Of things: That which blows. [II.]

(1) In the foregoing sense

(2) A child's name for the downy heads of Dandelion (Leontodon Taraxacum). [BLOW-BALL.]

II. Mechanics:

1. A machine for creating by means of pressure an artificial current of air. It is the same as a ventilator, engine as distinguished from a vacuum engine, such as an aspirator. A blower in the form of wooden bellows was used at Nuremberg in 1550. An improved blower with a flat vane reciprocating in a sector-shaped box, with a pipe for the grass of the air, was made about 1621, by F. Lannenschmid of Thuringia. The next type was that of cylinders with pistons, which is still in use. Another one still in use is the fan-blower, believed to have been invented by Teral in 1739. Yet another is the Water-bellows or Hydraulic bellows, first made by Hornblower. Blowing-machines were erected by Smeaton at the Carron Ironworks in 1760. The hot-air blast was patented in 1828 by the inventor, James Neilson of Glasgow. The main use of blowers is to increase draughts in furnaces, to ventilate buildings, to dry grain or powder, to evaporate liquids, &c.

2. An iron plate temporarily placed in front of an open fire, to urge the combustion.

3. A simple machine designed to furnish air to an organ or harmonium.

"... composition petals, hand and foot blowers ..." Advt., Times, Nov. 6, 1875.

III. Hat Manufacture: A machine for separating the hair from the fur fibres. [BLOWING-MACHINE.]

Blower and Sprender (Cotton Manufacture): A machine for spreading cotton into a lap, the action of beaters and blower being conjoined for the purpose. [COTTON-CLEANING MACHINE.]

blow-ĭng (1), * blöw-yńge, * blō-yńge, * blöw-and, pr. par., a., & s. [BLOW (1), v.] blowing-house.

Metal.: The blast-furnace in which tin-ore is fused. (Sherwood.) blowing-lands, blowing lands, s. pl.

Agric.: Lands of which the surface soil is so light that when dry it crumbles, and is liable to be blown away by the wind.

blowing-machine,

1. Iron-manuf.: A machine for creating an artificial draft by forcing air. (Blower.)

2. Hat-making: A machine for separating the "kemps" or hairs from the fur fibres.

3. Cotton-manuf.: A part of the batting-machine, or a machine in which cotton, loosened by willowing and scutching, one or both, is subjected to a draught of air produced by a fan, and designed to remove the dust, &c., from the fibre.

Steam-engine: The process of ejecting the super-salted water from the boiler, in order to prevent the deposition of scale or salt.

Steam-engine: A tap for blowing off steam.

"Blowing off tape, for use when the pistons are in motion."—Atkinson, Ganot's Physics, bk. vi., ch. i.

blowing pipe, s.

Glass-making: A glass-blower's pipe; a bunting-iron; a pontil.

Pottery: A pot of coloured slip for the ornamentation of pottery while in the lathe. The pot has a tube, at which the mouth of the workman is placed, and a spout like a quill, at which the slip exudes under the pressure of the breath. The ware is rotated in the lathe, while the hollows previously made in the ware to receive the slip are thus filled up. Excess of slip is removed, after a certain amount of drying, by a spatula or knife, known as a tournasin. (Knight.) blowing-through, s.

Steam-engine: The process of clearing the engine of air by blowing steam through the cylinder, valves, and condenser before starting.

blowing tube, s.

Glass-making: An iron tube from four to five feet in length, and with a bore from one-third to one inch in diameter. It is used to blow melted glass or metal, as it is called, into some kind of hollow vessel. (Glass-blowing, Pontil, Pontil.)

blōw-pipe, s. & a. [Eng. blow; pipe.]

A. As subst.: An instrument for directing the flame of a lamp, of a candle, or jet of gas, mixed with air, against a spot on which is placed a minute body which the operator designs to subject to the action of more than ordinarily intense heat. The several types of blowpipe are —

1. The Mouth Blowpipe: This consists of a conical tube of tin-plate about eight inches long, open at the narrow end and closed at its lower part, from the side of which projects a small brass tube about an inch long, at the extremity of which is a brass jet. The jet is inserted about one-eighth of an inch into the flame of a lamp, and a current of air is blown into the flame, which then assumes the form of a pointed cone (see figure). In the centre there is a well-defined blue cone, consisting of a mixture of air with combustible gases; in the front of which is a luminous portion, containing the unburnt gases at a high temperature. This is the reducing flame; and outside it is a pale yellow one terminating at the point O. The part now described contains oxygen at a high temperature, mixed with the products of complete combustion, being the oxidising part of the flame. The mouth blow-pipe is of great antiquity: a man using one for metallurgic purposes is represented in an ancient painting at the Egyptian Thebes. It was used by jewellers during the Middle Ages for fusing metals; its employment as an instrument for mineralogical and chemical analysis is mainly due to Antony Swab, a Swedish councillor of mines, in 1738, also [illegible] who published a "System of Mineralogy" 1758. There are various forms of blowpipe as Gahn's, Wollaston's, and Dr. Black's. To use the blowpipe it is necessary to acquire the art of keeping the lungs supplied with air through the nostrils, whilst necessary a steady stream through the blowpipe in the mouth; the communication between mouth and the lungs being closed by a peculiar action of the tongue, which is drawn back against the orifice. The small body to be subjected to examination may be held in a small forceps, or if easily fusible, on a small silver or platinum spoon, but the ordinary rest, the one used to support metallic [illegible] and many other minerals, is of [illegible] charcoal, in which a small cavity has been made with a knife. The body to be examined should not be larger than a peppercorn.

¶ In chemical analysis the blowpipe is used to examine solid substances.

(a) Heated on charcoal, oxides of [illegible] copper, and silver, &c., yield metallic beads by the reducing flame, especially when mixed with carbonate of sodium or [illegible] oxide of potassium.

(b) The blowpipe is used to make borax beads (q.v.)

(c) Under its operation some substances are found to be fusible and others [illegible] the latter category are ranked most [illegible] arsenic, and ammonium compounds.

(d) Salts of zinc give a green colour when heated on charcoal with $Co(NO_3)_2$ cobalt nitrate; aluminium salts, phosphates or silicates a blue colour, salts of magnesium a pink colour.

(e) Chromium salts fused with potassium nitrate, on platinum foil, give [illegible] of potassium chromate; manganese salts green mass of potassium manganate.

(f) Salts of certain metals give characteristic colours when moistened with hydrochloric acid and heated in the blowpipe flame: sodium salts give yellow, potassium [illegible] violet, strontium and lithium salts [illegible] calcium salts orange-red, barium [illegible] green, thallium salts green, and [illegible] blue-green colours.

(g) Certain metals give incrustations on charcoal when heated in the oxidising flame. Lead gives yellow, bismuth [illegible] antimony bluish-white, and [illegible] brown incrustations.

2. The Bellows Blowpipe, i.e. [illegible] which the flame is supplied by [illegible] human breath but from a pair of bellows. It is used chiefly by glass-blowers, glass-enamellers, &c.

3. The Oxyhydrogen Blowpipe is [illegible] not common air but a mixture of [illegible] hydrogen is used. These [illegible] from two separate reservoirs [illegible] unite in a single jet, or to [illegible] mon bladder through the side [illegible] ming, are the directed [illegible] with the result of producing [illegible] as to fuse [illegible] quite infusible under the [illegible] oxyhydrogen flame [illegible] by Prof. Robert Hare [illegible] was also made by Sir H. [illegible] at the suggestion of Mr. Children.

4. The Arrohydrogen blowpipe, in which [illegible] spheric air and hydrogen are [illegible] used.

(c) Of the cloudless sky, azure.

"Three gaudy standards flout the pale blue sky."
Byron: Childe Harold, i. 41.

(d) Of water in certain circumstances.

(i.) Of the sea.

¶ Poets conventionally call the sea "blue." Near the shore it is generally green, yellow sand below often affecting its colour. Far from the land it is oftener blue. The "Red" Sea may often be seen of a beautiful blue colour.

"The sea, the blue lone sea, hath one—He lies where pearls lie deep."
Hemans: The Graves of a Household.

(ii.) Of lakes. This also is somewhat conventional.

"Over the blue lake . . ."
Hemans: Edith.

(iii.) Of rivers and streams. So also is this somewhat conventional.

"The poet as it fled by my own blue streams!"
Hemans: The Land of Dreams.

2. Figuratively: Highly derived, aristocratic—as "blue blood."

II. Technically:

1. Optics: The colour produced in a body when the blue rays which constitute one component in light are reflected, all other rays being absorbed.

2. Physic. science, spec. Bot.: A series of colours containing, besides the typical species, Prussian blue, indigo, sky blue, lavender-colour, violet, and lilac (q.v.). The typical blue most nearly approaches indigo, but is lighter and duller than that deep hue. (See Lindley: Introd. to Bot., 3rd ed., 1839, pp. 479, 480.)

3. Painting: For painters' colours see C. II.

4. Her.: [Azure.]

III. Political, religious, & academical conditions. Now redeemed from former humble associations, see II. 4, it stands

1. Politically: In London and many parts of England though not everywhere, for a Conservative.

2. Religiously:

(1) In England: Originally a strict Puritan of Presbyterian views; a rigid Protestant belonging to the Church of England.

(2) In Scotland: A rigid Presbyterian supporting the Church of Scotland.

¶ In senses III. (1) and (2) the expression "true blue" is sometimes used. Thus a true blue Protestant is one who shows no proclivities towards Roman Catholicism, a true blue Presbyterian one very strict in his belief and practice.

"For his religion, it was fit
To match his learning and his wit,
'Twas Presbyterian true blue
For he was of that stubborn crew"
Hudibras, I. i. 189-91.

3. Academically: In the annual boat race and cricket match between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge those in favour of Oxford wear dark-blue colours, and those in favour of Cambridge light-blue. So also dark blue is worn by partizans of Harrow, and light-blue by those of Eton.

B. As adverb:

1. As if blue. [To look blue.]

"The lights burn blue."
Shakesp.: Rich. III., v. 3.

2. Into a blue colour; so as to look blue.

"Thefe pinch the maid as blue as bilberry."
Shakesp.: Mer. Wives, v. 5.

blŭnt-lỹ, adv. [Eng. blunt; -ly.] In an unpleasantly direct manner, brusquely, without circumlocution, without regard to the feelings of others.

"But came straight to the point, and blurted it out like a schoolboy:
Even the Captain himself could hardly have said it more bluntly."
Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, iii.

"Thou comest in so bluntly."
Shakesp.: Rich. III., iv. 2.

blŭnt-nĕss, * blŭnt-nĕsse, s. [Eng. blunt; -ness.]

1. Of a person's manner: Unpolite, not to say coarse, plainness of speech, or offensive rudeness of behaviour; straightforwardness; want of regard for the feelings of others.

". . . expressed that feeling, with characteristic bluntness, on the field of battle."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

2. Of a cutting or pointed instrument Dull, the reverse of sharp at the edge or point.

blŭr, v.t. [Skeat deems it a different spelling of blear; Dr. Murray, in noting this, suggests that it may be onomatopœic, combining the effect of blear and blot.]

1. Of material things: To make a blot, spot, or stain upon anything inadvertently or intentionally, with the effect of marring but not of obliterating it.

2. Of things immaterial: To blot, to stain, to sully.

"Such an act,
That blurs the grace and blush of modesty."
Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 4.

* blur-paper, s. A scribbler.

blŭr, * blŭrre, s. [From blur v. (q.v.).] A dark spot, a blot, a stain, or any other material thing which mars that on which it falls but does not obliterate it.

Eng. blusshen, bluschen = to glow, from A.S. blyscan, only in comp. ablyscung = shame, formed from A.S. blysian (only found in comp. ablysian) used to translate Lat. erubescere = to blush, to grow red; cog. with Dut. blozen = to blush, Dan. blusse = to blaze, to flame, Sw blossa = to blaze. All these verbs are formed from a subst. blys (* blys) in A.S. bǽlblys = a fire-blaze; cog. with Dut. blos = a blush, Sw. blos = a torch.]

A. Intransitive:

I. (Chiefly of the form blush): To become or be red.

1. Of persons: To become red in the cheeks, and to a certain extent also on the forehead, from agitation or confusion produced by more or less of shame—that shame springing from consciousness of guilt, demerit, or error, or from modesty or bashfulness.

"The lady blushed red, but nothing she said."
Scott: Eve of St. John.

¶ Formerly the person or thing causing the blush, if mentioned, was generally preceded by at; now for is much more frequently employed.

(a) Followed by at.

"He whin'd, and roar'd away your victory,
That pages blush'd at him."
Shakesp.: Coriol. v 5.

"You have not yet lost all your nature' modesty, but blush at your vices."—Calamy: Sermons.

(b) Followed by for.

"To her who had sacrificed everything for his sake he owed it so to bear himself that, though she might weep for him, she should not blush for him."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch v.

2. Of things:

(1) To be of a bright red colour. (Used of flowers, of the sky, &c.)

"But here the roses blush so rare."
Crashaw.

"In that bright quarter his propitious skies Shall blush betimes."
Cowper: Tirocinium.

† (2) To be of any bright colour; to bloom.

"Long wavy wreaths
Of flowers, that fear'd no enemy but warmth,
Blush'd on the pannels." Cowper: Task, v 186.

* II. (Of the forms blusch, blusche, bloche, blushen, blyschen): To glance, to look.

"As queen [Marched upon that baly."
Kerr Eng. Alite Poems (ed. Morris): Pearl, i. 60

* B. Trans.: To offer in the shape or form of a blush.

"I'll blush you thanks . . ."
Shakesp.: Wint. Tale, iv 4.

blŭsh, * blŭsch, * blŭsche, s. [BLUSH, v.]

1 Lit. Of persons: The state of blushing; the crimson hue produced in the cheeks, forehead, &c., by remorse, shame, modesty, bashfulness, or any similar cause.

"Here's a light crimson, there a deeper one,
A maiden's blush, here purples, there a white,
Then all commingled for our more delight."
Henry Peacham. Minerva, vol. ii.

¶ To put to the blush: To force one unintentionally to become red through shame.

"Ridicule, instead of putting guilt and error to the blush, turned her formidable shafts against innocence and truth."—Macaulay. Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. Fig. Of things:

(1) A crimson or roseate hue. (Used of the colour of a rose, of the sky, &c.)

"Ilanset, ere dawns the earliest blush of day."
Hemans. The Abencerrage.

(2) A look, a glance; sudden appearance.

"To hide a blyssful blusch of the bryght sunne."
Gaw. & the Grene Knight, 820.

¶ At the first blush, at first blush: At the first glance; at the first and sudden appearance of anything.

"All purely identical propositions, obviously, and at first blush, appear to contain no certain instruction in them."—Locke.

blush-rose, s. A variety of the rose of a delicate pink colour.

blŭsh'-ĕr, s. [Eng. blush; -er.] A person who blushes, or a thing which is red.

"I envy not Arabian odours, whilst that of this fresh blusher charms my senses; and I find my nose and eyes so ravishingly entertained here, that the bee extracts less sweetness out of flowers."—Boyle. Occas. Reflect., § 5, ref. 4.

• blŭsh'-ĕt, s. [Dimin. of blush.] A young bashful or modest girl prone to blush with slender cause for doing so.

¶ Nares says that it is apparently peculiar to Ben Jonson.

"N.—Pecunia
Is to be seen, though mistress Bond would speak,
Or little blusher Wax be ne'er so easy."
B. Jonson. Staple of News, ii. 1.

blŭsh'-fŭl, a. [Eng. blush; full.] Full of blushes; suffused with blushes. (Lit. & fig.)

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

¶ Blushing honours: Honours fitted to elicit commendations likely to put the bearer or possessor, if modest, to the blush. Or as Blush, v., A. 2 (2).

"To-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope; to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honours thick upon him."
Shakesp. Hen. VIII., iii. 2.

C. As substantive: The state of having the face, the neck, and even the breast suffused under the influence of emotion with a red colour.

¶ For the physiological cause of blushing see the subjoined examples.

"Blushing is produced through an affection of the mind, acting primarily on the centre of emotion, and through it on the nerves, which are distributed to the capillary vessels of the skin of the face."—Todd & Bowman's Physiol. Anat., vol. i., ch. ii., p. 28.

"The region affected by blushing is the face and neck, and the effect arises from the suspension of the cerebral influence that keeps up the habitual contraction of the smaller blood-vessels over that region."—Bain. The Emotions and the Will, 2nd ed., ch. i., p. 11.

blŭsh'-ĭng-lў, adv. [Eng. blushing; -ly. In a blushing manner. (Webster.) bō-a, s. [In Dan., Fr., &c., boa; from Lat. boa or boa (Plinii) = an enormous snake, said to have been anciently found in India. None, however, are at present known to occur there more than six feet long. The spelling bora is from bos, bovis = an ox, either from the notion that these snakes could carry off oxen, or from the erroneous notion that they sucked the teats of cows.]

1. Zool.: A genus of serpents, the typical one of the family Boidæ. The species are found chiefly in America, the analogous genus in the East popularly confounded with it, namely Python, being distinguished from it by the presence of intermaxillary teeth.

2. Ord. Lang.: A long fur tippet or comforter worn by some ladies round their necks. The name is given on account of its resemblance to the boa constrictor or some other large snake.

boa constrictor, boa-constrictor, s. The Mod. Lat. word constrictor is = he who or that which binds or draws together; from Class. Lat. constrictum, supine of constringo = to bind together; con = together, and stringo (supine strictum) = to draw tight. [See 1, Zool.]

1. Zool.: The best known species of the genus Boa. The specific name constrictor, meaning binder or drawer together, refers to the method through which the animal destroys its prey by coiling itself round it and gradually tightening the folds. It is about thirty feet long. It is found in South America. (BOA.)

2. Ord. Lang.: Any very large snake which crushes its prey by coiling itself round it. The unscientific portion of the general public are not particular as to where the animal came from at first, with them it is a boa constrictor whether its original habitat was in the Eastern or in the Western hemisphere. boarding-out, boarding out, a. & s.

As adj.: Causing to be boarded outside the workhouse.

Boarding-out system. Poor Law administration: A system by which workhouse children are sent to be boarded in the houses of poor people, to whom the sum paid for their maintenance is an object. They are then brought up, presumably in habits of industry, as members of the family in which they live. The boarding-out system is prevalent in Scotland. In England it exists only in a few places, and has become the subject of controversy. Its friends claim for it the advantage that when children are brought up away from the workhouse their pauper associations and feelings are permanently broken, and they tend to become ordinary members of society, living by their own industry and not on the ratepayers. Its opponents point out the danger of the poor people ill-treating the child not allied to them by blood. Both parties will probably agree in this, that when children are boarded out, lady or other visitors should from time to time visit the houses where they live to ascertain the kind of treatment they are receiving from their foster-parents, as well as from the genuine children of the household.

Naut.: A pike used to defend a ship against enemies who may attempt to board it. Or it

4. More fig.: A dry sarcasm, a taunt, a scoff, a jibe.

"Have you not sometimes observed what dry bobs, and sour-sweet jests, the most unloving fellows will throw and then bestow upon their betters."—Goodman: Wint. Ex. Conference, pt. i.

¶ To give the bob: To outwit, to impose upon. A similar phrase once existed, To give the dor. [Dor.]

"C. I guess the business. S. It can be no other But to gave me the bob."
Massinger: Maid of Honour, iv. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Horol., Mech., &c.: The weight at the lower part of a pendulum. (Airy: Popul. Astron., 6th ed., p. 283.)

2. Mechanics:

(1) The suspended ball of a plumb-line.

(2) The shifting weight on the graduated arm of a steelyard.

(3) The working beam of a steam-engine.

3. Metallurgy: A small buff-wheel used in polishing the insides of spoons. It is a disk of leather nearly an inch thick, known as sea-cow or bull-neck. It is perforated, mounted on a spindle, and turned into a nearly spherical form.

4. Mining: A rocking-post framed into a pivoted bar and driven by the crank of the water-wheel or engine-shaft. To one end of the beam is suspended the pump-rod, to balance which the other end is counter-weighted.

5. Music: A term used by change-ringers to denote certain changes in the working of the methods by which long peals of changes are produced (Trowte); a peal consisting of several courses or sets of changes. When there are more than three bells the several changes are called bob-majors, bob-triples, Norwich Court bobs, grandsire bob-triples, and caters (quaters). A bob is sometimes opposed to a single (q.v.). (Stainer & Barrett: Dict. Musical Terms. Grove: Dict. Music, &c.)

B. As adjective: Pertaining to a bob in any of the senses given under A.; as, bobtail, bob-wig (q.v.).

bob-cherry, bobcherry, s. A game among children in which a cherry is so hung as to bob against the mouth. The little player tries by jumping up to seize it with the teeth, the assistance of hands in the matter being disallowed.

"Bobcherry teaches at once two noble virtues, patience and constancy: the first, in adhering to the pursuit of one end, the latter, in bearing a disappointment meek."—Arbuthnot & Pope.

bob-fly, s. A kind of fly found upon water.

"You can easily find the bob-fly on the top of water."—Jesse: Gleanings in Nat. Hist., i. 200.

bob major, s. [From Latin major = greater.]

Music: A peal rung on eight bells.

bob maximus, s. [From Lat. maximus = greatest.]

Music: A peal rung on twelve bells.

bob minor, s. [From Lat. minor = less.]

Music: A peal rung on six bells.

bob-sled, s. A compound sled composed of two short sleds, one in front and another behind, connected together longitudinally by a reach.

bob-sleigh, s. A sleigh made up of two short (bob) sleighs connected by a reach or coupling.

bob-white, s. A perdicine bird so named from its note.

"In the North and East he is called Quail; in the South and West, he is Partridge; while everywhere he is known as Bob White."—A. M. Mayer: Sport with Gun and Rod.

bob-wig, bob wig, s. A short wig. Short wigs are very ancient, being found on old Egyptian and Assyrian sculptures and tablets. Long wigs are comparatively modern. It is said that they were introduced by Louis XIV., of France, to hide his shoulders, which were not well matched with each other.

Bob-wig.

"A young fellow riding towards us full gallop with a bobwig and a black silken bag tied to it, stopt short at the coach, to ask us how far the judges were behind."—Spectator.

bō'-bāc, s. [Pol. bobak = the animal described below.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A wooden pin with a head on which thread is wound for making use. [II. 1.]

"You cottager, who weaves at her own door, Pillow and bobbins all her little store."
Gay: Trivia.

II. Technically:

1. Spinning: A spool with a head at one or both ends to hold yarn. It is a one head when it serves as a cop in spinning, as a thread-holder in shuttles of looms, and as a cop in warping-machines. In spinning of warps it is slipped on a spindle and revolves therewith, being held thereon by a spring or by the tightness of its fit. (Knight.)

2. Sewing-machine: A small spool adapted to receive thread and to be applied with the shuttle. (Knight.)

bobbin and fly frame. An ordinary roving machine of the cotton manufacture. Its function is to draw and twist the sliver and wind the roving on a bobbin. The bobbins containing the slivers are mounted in several rows on a creel which has skewers for their reception. Each sliver passes between a pair of guides, which give it a horizontal traversing motion, so that it shall not bear upon a constant part of the surfaces of the drawing-rollers between which it next passes. These drawing-rollers are arranged in pairs (see Drawing-frame), and have a relatively increasing rate of speed, the second moving faster than the first, and the third faster than the second. The bobbin has two motions—one around the spindle on which it is sleeved, and up and down on the spindle. The former is for the winding on of the roving, and the latter to distribute the roving in coils alongside each other along the length of the bobbin. Bobbin and fly frames are of two kinds, coarse and fine, or first and second. The coarse, or first, bobbin and fly frame acts upon slivers from cans filled at the drawing-frame and placed at the back of the machine. The fine, or second, bobbin and fly frame acts upon rovings, or slubbings as they are often called, from bobbins filled at the first frame and placed on the skewers of the creel placed behind the roller-beam. (Knight.)

Weaving: Lace made upon a pillow with bobbins. The pillow is a hard cushion covered with parchment, on which the pattern of the meshes is drawn. Pins are inserted into the lines of the pattern and determine the meshes. Thicker thread, called gimp, is interlaced with the meshes, according to the pattern on the parchment. The thread is wound upon bobbins, and is twisted, crossed, and secured by pins. [PILLOW-LACE.]

bobbin-stand, s. A frame for holding the bobbins for warps of a loom, threads of a warping-machine, and yarns of a spinning-machine. The bobbin or reel rotates on a spindle fixed in a base-plate. It is covered with a metallic disk, supported a little above the top of the spool on a shoulder of the spindle, and held down by a screw-nut.

Weaving: A device for winding thread or yarn upon a bobbin. The bobbin is supported on a fixed shaft, which is made to rotate continuously.

Sewing-machine: A device adapted to receive a shuttle-bobbin and rotate it so that it may be wound with thread. The winders are usually operated by being turned in contact with the driving-wheel, balance-wheel, or band. Some winders are supplied with an automatic thread-distributor, to lay the thread evenly.

bŏb-bin-ĕt, s. [Eng. bobbin; (n)et.]

Weaving: A machine-made cotton net, originally imitated from the lace made by bobbins upon a pillow. It consists of a series of parallel threads which may be considered as warp-threads, and two systems of oblique threads which proceed from the right to the left, and from the left to the right respectively. Each weft thread has a single turn around each crossing of a warp, and the contrary strain of the respective weft threads gives a serpentine course to the warps.

bobbinet-machine, s. A machine for making bobbinets. It was originally derived from the stocking-frame, invented in 1589 by William Lee, M.A., of Cambridge. Hammond (about 1768) modified a stocking-frame to make a coarse imitation of Brussels ground; this was the pin-machine. In 1784, the warp-frame was invented, for making warp-lace; and in the next decade, the bobbin-frame. In 1809, Heathcote invented the bobbinet-machine. (Knight.)

bŏb-bing, pr. par. & a. [BOB, v.]

"Wi' bobbing Willie's shanks are mair."
Hend Colt, ii. 116. (Jamieson.)

"You may tell her,
I'm rich in jewels, rings, and bobbing pearls.
Pluck'd from Moors' ears." Dryden.

bŏb-bin-work, s. [Eng. bobbin; work.] Work wrought partly by means of bobbins.

"Not netted nor woven with warp and woof but after the manner of bobbin-work."—Grew: Museum.

bŏb-bit, pa. par. [BOBBED.] (Scotch.) bō bi ĕr rite, s. [Named by Dana after Boberre, who first described it in 1866.]

Mineralogy: A colourless mineral occurring in six-sided prisms. It is a tribasic phosphate of magnesia. It was found in Peruvian guano.

bō-bi-nā-tion, s. [From Low Lat. bobinatio, of same meaning.]

Music: A kind of sol-faing taught by Huberto Waimont at the end of the sixteenth century for scale practice, the designations of the notes used being bo, re, di, go, la, mi, and na. It was called also BOUDINATION (q.v.). The friends and the opponents of the system carried on a controversy which continued till the beginning of the eighteenth century. (Stainer & Barrett.) bŏb-ō-lĭnk, bŏb-lĭnk, * bŏb-lin-cōln, s. [Evidently from a proper name, Bob Lincoln or Bob o(f) Lincoln.] A bird belonging to the family Sturnidæ (Starlings), and the sub-family Agelainæ. It is found everywhere in North America below 54° of N. latitude, passing the winter in the West Indies, and going northward in summer. In the United States it is known as the Rice-bird, the Reed bird, the Rice Bunting, the Rice Troopial, and in the West Indies, when fat, as the Butter-bird. It is the Emberiza oryzivora of Linnæus, Icterus agripennis of Bonaparte, and Dolichonyx oryzivorus of Swainson. It feeds on rice and other cereals, and is in turn itself extensively shot for food.

bŏb-stāy, s. [Eng. bob; stay.]

Naut.: One of the chains or ropes which tie the bowsprit end to the stem, to enable it to stand the upward strain of the forestays.

bobstay-piece, s.

Where I may hassle rike as free and neare
As any mercer; or the whale bone man
That quilts thee bodies I have leave to span."
Ben Jonson: An Elegy.

2. Now, always sing.; if a pl. be required, bodices being used:

(1) Lit.: A corset or waistcoat, quilted with whalebone or similar material, worn by women.

"Her bodice half way she unlac'd,
About his arms she gently cast
The silken band, and bad him fast."
Percy Reliques, II. xi. 3.

(2) Fig.: Restraint of law, or restraint of any kind.

"It was never, he declared with much spirit, fitted politic to put trade into straitlaced bodys, or to, instead of making it grow upright and thrive as either hill it or force it awry."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

bôd'-ied, prep. & pa. par. of body, v. (q.v.). [ABLE-BODIED.]

• bôd'-i-kin, s. [Eng. body, s., with dim. suf. -kin.]

1. A little body. (Bailey.)

2. An oath, esp. in the form God's bodikins (cf. Hamlet, ii. 2; Merry Wives, ii. 3).

bôd'-i-lĕss, a. [Eng. body, and suff. -less.] Without a body; having no body; incorporeal.

• bôd'-i-li-nĕss, s. [Eng. bodily, and suff. -ness.] The quality or state of possessing a body.

bôd'-i-ly, • bôd'-i-li, • bod y ly, • bo-i-liche, a. & adv. [Eng. body, -ly.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of the human or animal body: Pertaining to the body; constituting part of the body made by the body, affecting the body; incident to the body.

¶ When the human body is referred to, it is generally as opposed to the mind.

"I would not have children much beaten for their faults, because I would not have them think any pain the greatest punishment."—Locke.

"... an example of personal courage and of bodily exertion."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

2. Gen. Of a body in the sense of existing material: Composed of matter, pertaining to matter, or to material things, appreciable to the senses.

"What resemblance could wood or stone bear to a spirit void of all sensible qualities, and bodily dimensions?"—South.

3. More fig.: Real, actual, as distinguished from what is merely thought or planned.

"Whatever hath been thought on in this state,
That could be brought to bodily act, ere Rome Had circumvention."
Shakesp: Coriol., i. 1.

B. As adverb:

1. Corporeally, united with matter.

"It is his human nature, in which the godhead dwells bodily, that is advanced to these honours and to this empire."—Watts.

¶ In Col. ii. 9, bodily is the rendering of the Gr. σωματικῶς (sōmatikōs), which is an adverb. The precise meaning is uncertain; it means (1) corporeally, (2) truly, or (3) substantially.

"For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."—Col. ii. 9.

2. So to act as in some way or other to "set the whole body; wholly, completely, entirely, as "... leaps bodily below." (Lowell: in Goodrich & Porter.)

¶ So also colloquial phrases like those we used: "The tiger carried off the man bodily," or, "the flood carried away the bridge bodily."

bôd'-ing, pr. par. & s. [BODE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

"Not free from boding thoughts, a while The shepherd stood;"
Wordsworth: Pedlar.

"Then darkly the words of the boding strain Like an omen rose on his mind again."
Hemans: Records of the Dead.

B. As substantive:

1. Of persons: A foreboding, an expectation, a prophecy, a vaticination, a forecast.

"Say—that his bodings came to pass."
Byron: The Giaour.

† 2. Of things: An omen, a portent.

bôd'-kin (1), • bôd'-i-kin, • bôd-e-kin, • boy-de-kin, • bod y kin, s. [Etym. doubtful; the second element is certainly the usual Eng. dimin. suffix. Skeat thinks that we may consider boi-de and bode corruptions of the Celtic word now represented by Ir. biodag; Gael. biodag, and W. bidog = a dirk, a dagger.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of things:

• (1) Originally: A small dagger.

"With bodkins was Cæsar Julius Murder'd at Rome of Brutus Cassius."
Chaucer: Cron. Liber, in MS.

"When he himself might his quietus make With a bare bodkin."
Shakesp. Hamlet, iii. 1.

¶ Still used in this sense in poetry or in antiquarian cast.

"Long after rusted that bodkin's point."
Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, v. 8.

(2) Subsequently:

(a) An instrument wherewith to dress the hair.

"You took constant care
To bodkin, comb, and smooth to prepare:
For this your locks in paper durance bound."
Pope: Rape of the Lock, iv. 98.

(b) A large-eyed and blunt-pointed threading instrument for leading a tape or cord through a hem.

"Or pinn'd in haste o'er . . . or rushes lie,
Or want'd whole ag.s . . . bodkin's eye."
Pope: Rape of the Lock, ii. 126.

*(c) A frizzling-iron.

*3. Of persons: One wedged in between two others for whom there is only sufficient room. (Used also adjectively.)

"Costly sat bodkin."—F. Montgomery: Thrown To-gether, ii. 82.

To ride or sit bodkin: To ride or sit wedged in between two others.

II. Technically:

1. Printing: A printer's tool, something like an awl, for picking letters out of a column or page in correcting.

2. Bookbinding: A pointed steel instrument for piercing holes.

bŏd-kin (2), s. [A corruption of baudekin, or baudekin (q.v.).] A rich kind of cloth worn in the Middle Ages, the web being gold and the woof silk, with embroidery.

¶ The word bodkin (2) does not much occur alone; it is used chiefly in the expression, "Cloth of bodkin."

"Or for us meaner pieces of cloth of bodkin, Tissue, gold, silver, &c."
Massinger: City Madam, ii. 1.

bŏ-dle, †bŏd-dle, s. [Corrupted from Bothwell, an old Scottish mint-master, as other coins were called Atchesons for a similar reason.]

1. Lit.: A copper coin, of the value of two pennies Scots, or the third of an English half-penny.

"So far as I know, the copper coins of two pennies, commonly called two penny pieces, boddles, or turners, began to be coined after the Restoration, in the beginning of Charles II.'s reign: those coined under William and Mary are yet current, and our country-men complain, that since the union, 1707, the coinage of these was all-together laid aside, whereby these old ones being almost consumed, there is no small scarcity in coin in the commerce of things of low price, and hinderance to the relieving the necessities of the poor."—Ruddi. Introd. Anderson's Diplom., p. 100. (Jamieson)

2. Fig.: Anything of little value.

¶ Not to care a bodle corresponds in Scotch to the English phrase, not to care a farthing.

"He cares no' for that a bodle."—Scott: Waverley, ch. xxiii.

"Fair play, he cares na deils a boddle."
Burns: Tam O'Shanter.

Bŏd-lē-an, †Bŏd-lēy-an, a. & s. [From Sir Thos. Bodley, who was born A.D. 1544, and died A.D. 1612.]

A. As adjective: Pertaining to Sir Thos. Bodley.

B. As substantive: The library described below. (Lit. & Ag.) [BODLEIAN LIBRARY.]

"... by the gift of many Large Paper copies, that vast submarine Bodleian, which stands in far less risk from fire than the insolent Bodleian of the upper world."—De Quincey: Works, 2nd ed., i. 146.

Bodleian or † Bodleyan Library, s. A library founded at Oxford by Sir Thos. Bodley, in 1597, who presented to it about £10,000 worth of books, and induced others also to become donors to the institution. The library was opened to the public on November 8, 1602. The first stone of a new building to accommodate it was laid on July 10, 1610. In 1868 it contained about 250,000 volumes. All members of the University who have taken a degree are allowed to read in it, as are literary men belonging to this and other countries. As in the case of the British Museum library, the books are not allowed to be taken out of the reading-room.

† bod rage, † bod-rake, s. [BORDRAGE.]

† bod-word, s. [BODEWORD.] (Barbour: The Bruce, xv. 423.)

bŏd-ȳ, † bŏd-ȳe, † bŏd-ie, † bŏd-i, s. & a. [A.S. bodig = (1) bigness of stature, (2) the trunk, chest, or parts of it, † (3) the body, the whole man (Somner); O. H. Ger. botach, potach = body; Gael. bodhaig = the human body; compare also bodhcann = a body in the sense of a hoop or band. Hindust. badan; Sans. bandha.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

(1) Lit.: The material framework of man or of any of the inferior animals, including the bones, the several organs, the skin, with hair, nails, and other appendages.

"And that most blessed bodie, which was borne Without all blemish or reproachfull blame Spenser: Hymne of Heavenly Love.

"All the valiant men arose, and went all night, and took the body of Saul and the bodies of his sons from the wall . . ."—1 Sam. xxxi. 12.

Out of the body, absent from the body: Dead: having the soul dismissed from the body by death.

". . . to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."—2 Cor. v. 8.

(II) Figuratively:

1. Of things:

(1) Bodily strength or ability.

"Mow he myght help him, throw body Mollyt with hey chevalry."
Barbour, x. 510, MS. (Jamieson)

(2) Matter as opposed to spirit, matter as opposed to other matter; a material substance; a portion of matter; as, a metallic body, a combustible body.

"Even a metalline body, and therefore much more a vegetable or animal, may by fire, be turned into water."—Boyle.

(3) Substance, essence.

(a) Gen.: In the foregoing sense.

". . . to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature; to shew virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 2.

(b) Of wine: Strength; as, wine of a good body.

(c) Substance as opposed to a shadow; reality as opposed to representation.

"A shadow of things to come: but the body is of Christ."—Col. ii. 17.

(4) The main portion of anything as distinguished from the smaller and detached portions, as the body—i.e., the hull of a ship, the body of a coach, of a church, of a tree, &c.

". . . from whence, by the body of Euphrates, as far as it headed westward, and afterward by a branch thereof."—Raleigh.

"This city has navigable rivers that run up into the body of Italy; they might supply many countries with fish."—Addison.

(5) A general collection, a pandect; as, a body of divinity, a body of the civil law.

(6) A garment, a vestment.

"A body round thy Body, wherein that strange Then of things not sung, defying all variations of climate."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. i., ch. iii.

2. Of persons:

(1) Individually.

(a) A person, a human being, with no contempt indicated. (Eng.)

¶ In this sense it is now rarely used, though it was once, as an independent word, but it still remains in the very common compound terms, anybody, nobody, somebody, everybody, &c. (q.v.). [ANYBODY, SOMEBODY, &c.]

"'Tis a passing shame
That I, unworthy body as I am,
Should censure thus on lovely gentlemen."
Shakesp.: Two Gent. of Verona, i. 2.

"A deliver'd maid
And by an eminent body, that enforc'd
The law against it."
Shakesp.: Meas. for Meas., iv. 4.

(b) A contemptuous term for a human being, man or woman, of humble lot, or in a pitiable plight. (Scotch.) (Generally in this sense pronounced in the pl. buddies.)

". . . and that's the gate fisher-wives live, puir slaving bodies."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xxvi.

"Toun's bodies ran, an stood abeigh,
An cast their mad."
Burns: The Auld Farmer's New Year Morning Salutation to his Auld Mare Maggie.

(2) Collectively.

(a) A corporation; a number of men united by a common tie or organized for some purpose, as for deliberation, government, or business.

". . . every peer accused of high treason should be tried by the whole body of the peerage."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

(b) A mass of men, even when not so united.

". . . life and death have divided between them the whole body of mankind."—Hooker.

(c) The main part of an army; the centre, as distinguished from the wings, the vanguard, and the rearguard.

"The van of the king's army was led by the general and Willmot, in the body was the king and the prince, and the rear consisted of one thousand foot, commanded under Colonel Thelwell."—Clarendon.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between body, corpse, and carcass:—"Body, here taken in the improper sense for a dead body, . . . is applicable to either men or brutes, corpse to men only, and carcass to brutes only, unless when taken in a contemptuous sense. When speaking of any particular person who is deceased, we should use the simple term body; the body was suffered to lie too long unburied. When designating its condition as lifeless, the term corpse is preferable; he was taken up as a corpse. When designating the body as a lifeless lump separated from the soul, it may be characterised (though contemptuously) as a carcass; the fowls devour the carcass." (Crabb: Eng. Syn.)

II. Technically:

1. Geom.: Any solid figure; as, a spherical body.

"The path of a moving point is a line, that of a geometric body is another body."—Wentworth: Trans. (Goodrich & Porter.)

2. Physics: An aggregate of very small molecules, these again being aggregates of still smaller atoms. The object of physics is the study of the phenomena presented by bodies. (Ganot: Physics (trans. by Atkinson), 5th ed., p. 1.)

3. Alchem. Pl. (bodies): Metallic bodies, metals, answering to the celestial bodies—i.e., to the planets. They are contradistinguished from spirits—i.e., such bodies as can be driven off in vapour; four such spirits and seven bodies were recognised. (See ex.)

"I wol you telle as was me taught also
The foure spirits, and the bodies seven
By ordre, as ofte herd I my lord neven.
The first spirit quyksilver called is
The second orpiment, the thridde I wis
Sal armoniak, and the ferthe verrnisoun.
The bodies seven, eek, lo hem here anon.
Sol gold is, and Luna silver we threpe,
Mars yren, Mercurie quyksilver we clepe;
Saturnus leed, and Jupiter is tyn,
And Venus copper, by my fader kyn."
Chaucer: C. T., Yeoup's T., 619-629.

*4. Arch.: The old term for what is now generally called main or middle aisle of the nave of a church, and is perhaps occasionally used for the whole nave, including the aisles.

"And the forsaide Richard sall make the body of the Kirke accordaunt of wideuse betwene the pilers to the quere."—Contract for Cathrick Church, p. 8. (Illustr. of Mus.)

10. Painting: Consistency, thickness.

¶ To bear a body: A term used of colours which can be ground so fine and so thoroughly mixed with oil that they seem a coloured oil rather than colour to which oil has been added.

11. Law:

(1) Of things: The main part of an instrument as distinguished from the introduction and signature. (Wharton.)

(2) Of persons: The person ordered to be brought up under a habeas corpus act. (Wharton.)

B. As adjective: Designed for the body; as, body-clothes; personal, as, a body-servant; in any other way pertaining or relating to the body. (See the compound words.)

body-bending, s. Bending the body. (Used of toil.)

"With the green alms and body-bending toil
Of a poor brotherhood who walk the earth
Pitied, and, where they are not known, despised."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

body-clothes, † body cloaths, s. pl. Clothing for the body. (Used more of cloths, rugs, or anything similar cast over or wrapped around horses, than of vestments for human beings.)

"I am informed that several asses are kept in body-cloaths, and sweated every morning upon the heath."—Addison.

body-colours, s. pl. Colours which have "body," thickness, or consistency, as distinguished from taste or weight. (Ogilvie.)

2. A variety of Limnite.

bog-jumper, bog jumper, s. The Bittern (Botaurus stellaris). (Scotch.) bog-land, bog land, s. & a.

A. As substantive: Land or a country which is boggy.

B. As adjective: Living in or belonging to a marshy country.

"Men without heads and women with at teat, Each bring his love a bog-land captive home."
Ingelow: Prod to the Prophets.

bog-manganese, s.

Min.: A variety of Wad (q.v.). It consists of oxide of manganese and water, often with lesser amounts of oxide of iron, silica, alumina, &c. Upwardite and Retinalite are sub-varieties of it.

bog-moss, s. A common book-name for various species of Sphagnum. (Irish, Britten & Holland.) bog myrtle, bog myrtle, s.

Bot.: A name for the Sweet Gale or Dutch Myrtle (Myrica gale). Though frequently the Myrtle, it has no real affinity to it. (Gale Myrtle.) bog-nut, s.

Bot.: The Buckbean, or Marsh Trefoil (Menyanthes trifoliata).

bog-oak, s. Oak timber found [illegible] bog-orchis, s.

Bot.: The English name of [illegible] genus Malaxis, and specially [illegible] British species, M. paludosa. It is a small plant, from two to four inches [illegible] minute erect greenish spikes of flowers. It lives in spongy bogs, flowering from July to September.

bog-ore, s. [Bog iron-ore.]

bog-pimpernel, bog pimpernel, s.

Bot.: A British species of Pimpernel, the Anagallis tenella. It is found, as its English name imports, in bogs, and not like its congener, the Scarlet Pimpernel (A. arvensis), in corn fields. It is a small creeping plant with rose-coloured flowers.

bog-rush, s.

1. Bot.: An English book-name for Schœnus, a genus of the order Cyperaceæ (Sedges). As now limited it contains only the Black Bog-rush, a plant found on wet moors, and recognisable on account of its dark brown, nay almost black, heads of flowers. The additional British species once placed in it are now transferred to other genera.

bō-hēa, s. & a. [From Wui, pronounced by the Chinese Bui, the name of the hills where this kind of tea is grown (Mahn).]

A. As substantive:

* 1. Originally: Any kind of black tea, the assumption being made that it came from the Wui hills in China or their vicinity. Green tea was distinguished as hyson. Perhaps in the poetic examples bohea may mean tea in general.

"As some frail cup of China's fairest mold
The tumults of the boiling bohea braves,
And holds secure the coffee's nobler waves."
Pitchell.

"To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,
To muse, and spill her solitary tea."
Pope Epistle to Mrs Blount, 15, 16

2. Spec.: A designation (which became obsolete or obsolescent about the middle of the 19th century) given to a particular kind or quality of black tea. Nearly all the bohea imported came from the upland parts of the province of Fokien, the remainder being grown in Woping, a district of the Canton province. Of the black teas, bohea was the least valuable in quality, the order in the ascending scale being bohea, congou, souchong, and pekoe. Part of the bohea sold consisted of the fourth crop of the Fokien teas left unsold in the market of Canton after the season of exportation had passed. Mr Hugh M. Matheson writes, "Its colour was brown, the make rather ragged and irregular, and the flavour coarse."

"... to export European commodities to the countries beyond the Cape, and to bring back shawls, saltpetre, and bohea to England."—Macaulay Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

B. As adjective: Growing in Wui, brought from Wui (see etymology); consisting of, or in any way pertaining to the tea described under B.

"Coarse porter, consisting chiefly of sand, is part of the lades in which bohea tea was brought from China."—Woodward.

Bō-hē'-mi-an, a. & s. [Eng. Bohemi(a); -an.]

A. As adjective:

1. Pertaining or belonging to or brought from Bohemia (in Ger. Böhmen), an old kingdom now merged in the Austrian empire.

2. Wandering.

3. Unconventional, free from social restraints.

B. As substantive:

1. A native of Bohemia.

2. The Bohemian language.

3. A gipsy.

4. A literary man or artist who pays no regard to the conventionalities of society.

Bohemian chatterer, s. [BOHEMIAN WAXWING.]

Bohemian garnet, s.

Min.: Pyrope, a variety of Garnet (q.v.).

Bohemian glass, s.

Glass manuf.: A clear crown glass, a silicate of potash and lime, a little of the silicate of alumina being substituted for the oxide of lead. The silica for this glass is obtained by pounding white quartz.

Bohemian waxwing, s.

Ornith.: A bird, Ampelis or Bombycilla garrula, the only representative of the family Ampelidæ which visits Britain. In the male the chin, the throat, and a band over the eye are velvety-black, the forehead reddish-brown, the erectile crest reddish-chesnut, the upper parts purplish-red, brown, and ash coloured, the lower parts purplish-ash and brownish-red, the vent and tail coverts yellow. The wings are black and white, with a yellow spot, and have seven or eight of the secondary feathers tipped with small, oval, flattish appendages like sealing-wax. The female is less bright in colours. Length, about eight inches. It visits the north of Europe in flocks in winter, eating berries, insects when it can obtain them, and indeed almost all sorts of food. The epithet Bohemian refers to its wandering habits, not to its habitat. [AMPELIS, BOMBYCILLA, CHATTERER, WAXWING.]

bŏl'-ăr, s. [BOVAR.]

* bō'-ighe, s. [BOTCH.] (Scotch.) (Aberd. Reg., A. 1,534, v. 16.) (Jamieson.)

bō'-i-kin (1), s. [Etymology doubtful.] (Scotch.) The piece of beef called the brisket. (Jamieson.) bō'-i-kin (2), s. The same as bodkin, Eng. (q.v.). (Scotch.) bŏil, * bŏyl, * bŏil-en, * bŏy'-lyn, * bul-lyn, v.i. & t. [In Fr. bouillir; Prov. & Sp. bullir; Ital. bollire; from Lat. bullo, bullio = to be in bubbling motion, to bubble, to be in a state of ebullition (in imitation of the sound of a boiling liquid). Compare A.S. weallan = to spring up, to boil.]

A. Intransitive:

I. Literally:

1. Of liquids:

(1) To effervesce, to bubble up, as takes place when water or other liquid reaches what is called the boiling point. [BOILING POINT.]

"The formation and successive condensation of these first bubbles occasion the singing noticed in liquids before they begin to boil."—Ganot: Physics (trans. by Atkinson), 3rd ed., p. 267.

(2) To be agitated and send forth bubbles, the cause being mechanical agitation, as of the sea by the wind, and not great heat.

"He [leviathan] maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment."—Job xli. 31.

"In descending it may be made to assume various forms—to fall in cascades, to spurt in fountains, to boil in eddies, or to flow tranquilly along a uniform bed."—Tyndall Prog. of Science, 3rd ed., xiv 486.

2. Of anything placed in a liquid: To be for a certain time in a liquid in the state of effervescence through the application of great heat.

"Fillet of a fenny snake,
In the cauldron boil and bake."
Shakesp. Macb. iv 1.

3. Of a vessel containing a liquid: To have within it water which has reached the point of ebullition.

"The kettle boil'd ..."
Cowper Conversation: The Broken China.

II. Fig. Of human passions: To be intensely hot or fervent, or temporarily effervescent. [See examples under BOILING, pr. par. & a.]

B. Transitive:

1. Of liquids: To cause to bubble and rise to a certain point on the thermometer [BOILING POINT] by the application of heat.

2. Of things in such a liquid:

(1) Strictly: To subject to the action of heat in a liquid raised to the point of ebullition, with the view of cooking, or for any other purpose; to seethe.

"In eggs boiled and roasted, into which the water entereth not at all, there is scarce any difference to be discerned."—Bacon.

(2) More loosely: To subject to the action of a liquid heated to a less extent.

"To try whether seeds be old or new, the sense can not inform, but if you boil them in water, the new seeds will sprout sooner."—Bacon.

(3) To separate by evaporation; as, to boil sugar.

C. In special compound verbs. To boil over, v.i.:

1. Lit. Of liquids: So to expand through the influence of heat as to become too large for the vessel or other cavity in which it is contained, and in fact escape over the margin or brim.

"This hollow was a vast cauldron, filled with melted matter, which, as it boiled over in any part, ran down the sides of the mountain."—Addison on Italy

2. Fig.: To be effusive in the manifestation of affection or other passion.

"A few soft words and a kiss, and the good man melts: see how nature works and boils over in him."—Congreve bŏil (1), * bile, * bule, s. [A.S. bȳl = a boil, blotch, sore (Bosworth); Icel. bóla, bóli; Dan. byld; Ger. beule.] [BEAL, BILE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: The disease described under II. 1. Med.

"Noysome scabbes,
Boiles and blotches, and brennyng sores, Prevayen and foul evilles."—Piers Plowman.

"But bounden sinnes and hidden him bite."—Lobe xvi. 20.

"Boils and plagues Plaster you o'er."
Shakesp. Coriol. I. 4.

2. Fig.: One who is a morally offensive spectacle.

"... thou art a boil,
A plague-sore."
Shakesp. Lear, ii. 4.

II. Technically:

1. Med.: A disease called by medical men furunculus (q.v.). It is a phlegmonous tumour, which rises externally, attended with redness and pain, and sometimes with a violent, burning heat. Ultimately it becomes pointed, breaks, and emits pus. A substance called the core is next revealed. It is purulent, but so thick and tenacious that it looks solid, and may be drawn out in the form of a cylinder, more pus following. The boil then heals.

¶ A blind boil is one which does not suppurate.

2. The boil of Scripture: שְׁחִין (shechin) seems to be used for two or three diseases.

(1) In Exod. ix. 9, 10, 11; Lev. xiii. 18, it may be an inflamed ulcer.

(2) In 2 Kings xx. 7, and Isaiah xxxviii. 21, it may be carbuncle, or the bubo of the plague.

(3) In Job ii. 7, it may be black leprosy.

¶ In Deut. xxviii. 27, 35, the same word שְׁחִין (shechin) occurs, though translated botch.

"The flesh also, in which, even in the skin thereof was a boil, and is healed, And in the place of the boil there be a white rising, ..."—Lev xiii. 18, 19.

bŏil (2), s. [From boil, v. (q.v.).] (Scotch.) The state of boiling.

"Bring your copper by degrees to a boil."—Maxwell: Ind. Trans., p. 272. (Jamieson.)

¶ At the boil: Nearly boiling.

bŏil'-ar-y, s. [Eng. boil; -ary.] [BOTANY] Water arising from a salt well belonging to a person who is not the owner of the soil. (Wharton.)

bŏiled, * bŏyld, pa. par. & a. [BOIL, v.t.] bŏil'-ĕr, s. & a. [Eng. boil; -er.]

A. As substantive:

1. Of persons: One who boils anything; spec., one whose occupation is to do so.

"That such alterations of terrestrial matter are not impossible, seems evident from that notable practice of the boilers of saltpetre."—Boyle

2. Of things: A vessel in which water or other liquid or any solid is boiled.

"This coffee-room is much frequented ... and there are generally several pots and boilers before the fire."—Woodward.

II. Technically:

Pneum.: A vessel in which liquid is boiled.

¶ Most kinds have separate names. Various household boilers are called kettles, saucepans, and clothes-boilers; one for raising steam, a steam-generator; one for dyeing a copper; one used in sugar-refining, a pan; one for distillation, a still; one for chemical purposes, a retort or an alembic; one for reducing lard and tallow, a digester, or, in some cases, a tank. (Knight.)

B. As adjective: Designed for a boiler, or in any other way pertaining to a boiler. (See the compounds which follow.)

boiler-alarm, s. An apparatus or device for indicating a low stage of water in steam-boilers. [STEAM-BOILER ALARM, LOW-WATER ALARM.]

boiler-feeder, s. An arrangement, usually automatic and self-regulating, for supplying a boiler with water.

boiler-float, s.

Steam-engine: A float which rises and falls with the changing height of water in a steam-boiler, and so turns off or on the feed-water.

boiler-furnace, s.

Steam-engine: A furnace specially adapted for the heating of a steam-generator. The shapes vary with those of the boilers themselves.

boiler-iron, s. Rolled iron of ¼ to ¾-inch thickness, used for making steam-boilers, tanks, the skin of ships, &c.

boiler-maker, s. A maker of boilers.

boiler-making, a. & s.

A. As adj.: Designed to be used in the making of boilers

"... boiler-making shop."—Times.

B. As subst.: The act or occupation of making boilers.

boiler-plate, s. A plate or sheet of iron, ¼ to ¾-inch thick, used in the construction of boilers boiler-protector, s. A non-conducting covering to prevent the escape of heat. Among the devices for this purpose may be cited—felt, treated in various ways, asbestos, and lagging. Allied to the above in position, if not in duty, are water-jackets to utilise the heat, air flues and shields to protect surrounding bodies against the radiated heat.

boiler-prover, s.

Hydraulics: A force-pump with pressure-indicator, used to try the power of a boiler to resist rupture under a given stress of hydraulic pressure.

boiler-stay, s.

Steam-engine: A tie-bar by which the flat plates on the opposite sides of boilers are connected, in order to enable them to resist internal pressure. The stays cross an intervening water or steam space.

boiler-tube, s.

Steam-engine: The tubes by which heat from the furnace is diffused through the mass of water in locomotive and other boilers of the smaller class. They are usually arranged longitudinally of the boiler, and are fitted by steam and water-tight connections to its heads.

boil'-ér-y, s. [Eng. boiler; -y.]

1. A salt-house or place where brine is evaporated.

2. A boilary (q.v.).

boil'-ing, *boy'-lyng, *boy'-lyńge, pr. par., a., & s. [BOIL, v.]

A. & B. As pres. part. & particip. adj.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

"The boiling waves and treacherous rocks of the Race of Alderney."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii boiling furnace, s.

Metallurgy: A reverberatory furnace employed in the decarbonation of cast-iron to reduce it to the condition for mechanical treatment by hammer, squeezer, and rolls, by which it is brought into bar or plate iron.

boiling point, boiling-point.

Physics, Chem., &c.: The point or degree of the thermometer at which any liquid boils. [BOILING.] The boiling point of any liquid is always the same, if the physical conditions are the same. It is altered by adhesion of the liquid to the surface of the vessel in which it is contained, or solution of a solid in the liquid raises the boiling point. Increase of pressure raises, while diminution of atmospheric pressure lowers, the boiling point. The boiling point of distilled water under the pressure of 760 millimetres is 100° C., or 212° F. A difference of height of about 327 metres lowers the boiling point of water about 1° C., or 597 feet ascent lowers it 1° F. Whatever be the intensity of the source of heat, as soon as ebullition commences the temperature of the liquid remains stationary. The boiling point of organic compounds is generally higher as the constitution is more complex. In a homologous series the boiling point rises about 19° for every additional CH_2 in normal alcohols, and 22° in the normal fatty acids, as ethylic alcohol, $C_2H_5(OH)$ 78·4°; propylic alcohol, $C_3H_7(OH)$ 97°; acetic acid, $CH_3CO\,OH$ 118°; propionic acid, $C_2H_5CO\,OH$ 140·6°. The secondary and tertiary alcohols have lower boiling points than the primary alcohols. The replacement of hydrogen in a hydrocarbon by chlorine, or by a radical, raises the boiling point, as benzene C_6H_6 82°, chlorbenzene C_6H_5Cl 135°, amidobenzene $C_6H_5(NH_2)$ 182°.

"These are the very solutions, it will be remembered, which behave singularly in respect of their refractive indices, and also of their boiling points."—Proceedings of the Physical Society of London, p. ii., p. 60.

bō-kar-dō, † bō-car-dō, s. A word without obvious meaning, constructed artificially to contain the vowels o, a, and again o, these being logical symbols. See def.]

I. Generally of the form bokardo:

Logic: The fifth mood of the third figure of syllogisms. A being the universal affirmative and O the particular negative, bokardo has a particular negative in the major premise, a universal affirmative in the minor one, and the conclusion, if correctly drawn, will also have a particular affirmative. In logical formula some Y's are not X's, every Y is Z, therefore some Z's are not X's; as, not all the kings of the world are really kingly, all doubtless are called so by the courtiers who surround them but this only shows that in some cases at least the interested statements of courtiers are wholly untrustworthy. Bokardo is sometimes called Dokamo

II. Of the form bocardo:

bol'-age, s. [Bullace.] (William of Palerne.) bō'-lar, bō'l-ar-ў, a. [Fr. bolaire.] Pertaining to bole; having the qualities of bole. [Bole, 5.]

"A weak and inanimate kind of lendstone, with a few magnetical lines, but chiefly consisting of a bolary and clammy substance."—Brown: Vulgar Errours.

bol'-as (1), s. [Bullace.] (Prompt. Parv.) bō'-las (2), s. [In Sp. bolas; from the Paraguay Indian language (?). But compare also Sp. bolear . . . = to throw a ball.] [Bole.] A kind of missile consisting of a single stone at the end of a rope, two or more stones connected by a rope, or anything similar, one kind or other of which is used by the Patagonians, the Paraguay Indians, and the Spanish and Portuguese inhabitants of South America. In war a Patagonian uses a one-stone bolas, hurling the stone at his adversary while retaining the string in his own hand. The Esquimaux bolas is made of a number of walrus' teeth at the end of strings knotted together. For the bolas of the South Americans of remote European descent, see the example which follows.

The b.-balls, or balls, are of two kinds: the simplest, which is chiefly used for catching ostriches, consists of two round stones covered with leather and united by a thin plaited thong about eight feet long. The other kind differs only in having three balls united by the thongs to a common centre. The Gaucho holds the smallest of the three in his hand and whirls the other two round and round his head; then, taking aim, sends them like chain shot revolving through the air. The balls no sooner strike any object than winding round it, they cross each other, and become firmly hitched. The size and weight of the balls vary according to the purpose for which they are made. When of stone, although not larger than an apple, they are cast with such force as sometimes to break the leg even of a horse. I have seen the balls made of wood, and as large as a turnip, for the sake of catching these animals without injuring them. The balls are sometimes made of iron, and these can be hurled to the greatest distance. The main difficulty in using either bolas or balls is to ride so well as to be able at full speed, and while suddenly turning about, to whirl them so steadily round the head as to take aim; on foot any person would soon learn the art."—Darwin: Voyage round the World, ch. iii., pp. 64, 65

bōl-bāg'-ēr-ĕs, s. [Gr. βολβός (bolbos), Lat. bulbus = a certain bulbous plant, a bulb, and κέρας (keras), a horn = bulbous-horned.]

Entom.: A genus of lamellicorn beetles with bulbous antennæ. They belong to the family Geotrupidæ. In India they often fly into the European bungalows in the evening, attracted, like other insects, by the glare of the lamps. A bolder transport seizes.
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.

3. Of figures and expressions in literary composition, of details in painting, architecture, &c.

(1) In a good sense: Executed with spirit, the reverse of tame.

Catachreses and hyperbates are to be used judiciously, and placed in poetry, as heightenings and shadows in painting, to make the figure bolder and raise it to stand off to sight. Dryden.

The cathedral church is a very bold work and a masterpiece of Gothick architecture."—Addison on Italy.

(2) In a slightly bad sense: Overstepping the usual limits; audacious even to temerity, in conception or execution.

"The figures are bold even to temerity."—Cowley.

"Which no bold tales of gods or monsters swell
But human passions, such as with us dwell."
Waller.

4. Of a coast or line of cliff: Standing out to the eye, running out into prominence; high and steep, abrupt, or precipitous.

And mingled with the pine trees blue
On the bold cliffs of Ben Venue.
Scott: Lady of the Lake, i. 5.

5. Of type or handwriting: Conspicuous, easily read, "A great, bold type."

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between bold, fearless, intrepid, and undaunted:—"Boldness is positive; fearlessness is negative; we may therefore be fearless without being bold, or fearless through boldness. Fearlessness is a temporary state: we may be fearless of danger at this, or at that time, fearless of loss, and the like; boldness is a characteristic, it is associated with constant fearlessness. Intrepidity and undauntedness denote a still higher degree of fearlessness than boldness: bold as a confident, it forgets the consequences; intrepidity is collected, it sees the danger, and faces it with composure; undauntedness is associated with unconquerable firmness of resolution; it is awed by nothing. The bold man proceeds on his enterprise with spirit and vivacity; the intrepid man calmly advances to the scene of death and destruction; the undaunted man keeps his countenance in the season of trial, in the midst of the most terrifying and overwhelming circumstances." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

B. As adverb: Boldly.

"And he him answerede medi and bold."
Story of Gen. & Exod. (ed. Morris), 1,718

C. As substantive. Plur. (Formed by the omission of a substantive, such as persons after the adjective.) Daring persons; as, "the bold."

D. In special phrases:

¶ To make bold: To take the liberty of saying or doing something audacious.

"I will make bold to send them."
Shakesp. Cymb., I. 6.

"Making so bold . . ."—Ibid., Hamlet, v. 2.

"I durst not make thus bold with owd . . ."—Dryden.

time or percussion fuse. It is fired from a mortar or howitzer. Bombs were used at the siege of Naples in 1434. Mortars for throwing bombs were cast in England in 1543. Bombs are now generally called shells, though the word bomb is not the least obsolete in the words bombard, bomb-shell, bombardier, &c. [Bomb-shell, Cascabel, Cast-steel, Grenade, Shell.]

2. Geol.: A bomb, or, more fully, a volcanic bomb, is a bomb-like mass of lava, spheroid, pear-shaped, or more irregular in form, and of various sizes, from that of an apple to that of a man's body. Bombs exist in the vicinity of recent or of extinct volcanoes or lava flows, and are supposed by Mr. Darwin to have been produced by a mass of viscid scoriaceous matter projected with a rapid rotatory motion through the air. Lyell makes them a modification of basaltic columns divided by cross joints. They may be seen near the prison in Edinburgh, or the flat topped basaltic hills of Central India, and elsewhere. Old volcanic rocks made up of a series of bombs fitting each other are sometimes called concentric nodular basalt.

"... to conclude that these bombs are connected with the trap-eruption of the neighbourhood."—Q. J. Geol. Soc., xl., pt. 1., 104.

B. As adjective: Consisting of a bomb; containing, or in any way pertaining or relating to a bomb. (See the compounds.)

bona-roba, bonarobba, s. [Robba is from Ital. roba = a robe, goods, estate.] A cant term for a handsome but wanton girl.

¶ Cowley seems to have considered it as implying a fine tall figure.

"I would neither wish that my mistress nor my fortune should be a bona-roba;—but as Lucullus says, Parvula . . . ."—Cowley: On Greatness. (Nares.)

* bona-socia, s. A good companion.

"Tush, the knaves keepers are my bona-socias and my pensioners."—Merry Devil of Edmonton, in Dodsley's Old Plays, v. 288.

* bón'-ą-ble, a. [For bonable = curable (Stevens), or from bonable = able in the bones, or bon = good, and able (Nares). A corruption of abominable (N.E.D.).] (See etym.)

"Dicons: it is vengeable knave, gammer, 'tis a bonable knave."—Gammer Gurton's Needle, iii. 2.

bón'-ăc-cord, s. [From Fr. bon = good, and accord = agreement.] Agreement; amity. (Scotch.)

"Articles of Bonaccord to be condescended upon by the magistrates of Aberdeen, . . . We heartily desire your subscriptions and seal to their reasonable demands, or a peremptory or present answer of bonaccord or mal-accord."—Spalding, i. 314, 316 (Jud.)

¶ It seems to have been formerly used by way of toast, as expressive of amity and kindness.

"During the time he was in Aberdeen, he got no bon-accord drunken to him in wine, whether it was refused, or not offered, I cannot tell."—Spalding, ii. 87.

¶ The term is associated chiefly with Aberdeen, which also is sometimes called the city of Bonaccord.

bón'-ąge, s. & a. [Etym. doubtful.]

bonace bark, s.

Bot.: The name of a shrub, the Daphne Mezereum, which grows in Jamaica.

bón-ą-par'-tē-ą, s. [Named after the world-renowned Napoleon Bonaparte. He was born at Ajaccio in Corsica on August 15, 1769, his remote ancestors being Italians connected with Tuscany. He compelled the evacuation of Toulon in 1793, became Brigadier-general of French artillery in February, 1794, and was appointed on February 23, 1796, to command the army of Italy, soon after gaining among other victories over the Austrians those of Montenotte on April 12, 1796; Lodi on May 10, 1796; and Arcola on November 14—17, 1796. In a Turco-Egyptian campaign were the victories of the Pyramids, July 13 and 21, 1798; Aboukir, July 25, 1799, and others. On Dec. 24, 1799, he became first-consul, and on June 14, 1800, he defeated the Austrians at Marengo; on August 2, 1802, he became consul for life, and on May 18, 1804, emperor. On November 13, 1805, he entered Vienna and on December 2 he gained the great victory of Austerlitz over the Russians and Austrians, and on October 14, 1806, that of Jena over the Prussians, entering Berlin on October 27. On February 7 and 8, 1807, he fought the indecisive battle of Eylau. On June 14, 1807, he was victorious over the Russians at Friedland. On May 12, 1809, he again entered Vienna. In conflict with Austria, he lost the battles of Aspern and Essling on May 21 and 22, 1809, but was successful at Wagram on July 5 and 6. A victory, but with heavy loss to the victors, was gained over the Russians at the Borodino on September 7, 1812. On the 14th he entered Moscow, from which he began his disastrous retreat on October 19. The battle of Bereuna was on November 26 and 27. He was victorious over the Russians and Prussians at Lutzen on May 2, 1813, and at Bautzen on 21st, but was decisively defeated by the Russians and Prussians at the great battle of Leipsic on October 16, 18, and 19. On April 5, 1814, he renounced the thrones of France and Italy, and consented to have his rule limited to the island of Elba. Reappearing in France on March 1, 1815, he was decisively defeated by Wellington at Waterloo on June 18, 1815, and, surrendering on July 15 to the English, died in exile in St. Helena on May 20, 1821.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That which ties or restrains.

(1) Of a physical tie or restraint:

(a) Cords, ropes, chains, or anything similar with which a person or other living creature is bound.

"Till, gnawing with my teeth my bonds in sunder,
I gained my freedom."
Shakesp.: Com. of Errors, v. 1.

(b) Anything which holds matter together, as attraction, cohesion, &c.; also that part of a built structure which ties the other portion together. [II. 1, 2, 3, 4.]

"Their round figure clearly indicates the existence of some general bond of union in the nature of an attractive force. . . ."—Herschel: Astron., 5th ed. (1851), § 388.

(2) Of a moral tie or restraint: That which restrains the conscience, the affections, the passions, or the will—viz., Divine or human law. Spec.—

(a) A vow to God.

"If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond: . . ."—Numb. xxx. 2.

(b) An oath or promise made to a human being, a formally contracted obligation, or its record in writing; a promise. [II. 6.]

"Go with me to a notary, seal me there Your single bond."
Shakesp.: Mer. of Ven., I. 3.

"What if I no or consent to make you mine.
My father's promise ties me not to time.
And bonds without a date, they say are void."
Dryden: Spanish Friar, iii. 3.

¶ The hymeneal bond: The matrimonial bond, the bond of marriage.

(c) The tie of affection.

"It does not feel for man, the natural bond
Of brotherhood is severed as the flax."
Cowper: The Task, bk. ii.

(d) Habit, produced by practice.

"Time was, he shrunk not he began the day
With decent duty, not ashamed to pray
The practice was a bond upon his heart,
A pledge he gave for a consistent part."
Cowper: Tirocinium.

(e) Other force, power, influence, or constraint.

"No wal non so wis than in al his bond,
The hede vnder this derknes bond."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 2,113-4.

2. The state of being tied or placed under physical or moral restraint.

(1) Sing.: Obligation; duty.

"I love your majesty According to my bond."
Shakesp. Lear, I. 1.

(2) Plur.: Chains taken by metonymy to stand for a state of imprisonment, with the suffering thus resulting.

"[He] have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds."—Acts xxiii. 29.

¶ In bond: In prison.

"And her virginitie like hidden in bond."
Story of Gen. & Exod., 2,078.

II. Technically:

1. Masonry: A stone or brick which is laid with its length across a wall, or extends through the facing course into that behind, so as to bind the facing to the backing. Such stones are known also as binders, bond-stones, binding-stones, through-stones, perpend-stones, and headers. [Cross-bond.]

2. Bricklaying: A particular mode of disposing bricks in a wall so as to tie and break joint. The English bond has courses of headers alternating with courses of stretchers. In the Cross-bond each course has stretchers and headers alternately. In the figure A is a header; B, a stretcher; C, a bond of hoop-iron; D, a timber-bond.

3. Roofing: The distance which the tail of a shingle or slate overlaps the head of the second course below. A slate 37 inches long, and having a margin of 12 inches gage exposed to the weather, will have 3 inches bond, or lap. The excess over twice the gage is the bond.

4. Carp.: Tie-timbers placed in the walls of a building, as bond-timbers, lintels and wall-plates.

5. Chem.: A graphic representation of the method in which the atomicity of an element in a molecule is satisfied by combination with another element, or elements, according to their atomicity. Thus a monad is represented as having one bond, a dyad as having two, a triad three, and a tetrad four. These are represented by straight lines connecting the atoms, thus, H—Cl, H—O—H, N(H,H,H), H>C<H,H (Example, Fownes's Inorganic Chemistry, 12th ed., p. 258.)

6. Law: A written acknowledgment or binding of a debt under seal. The person who gives the bond is called the obligor, and he to whom it is given the obligee. A bond is called single when it does not contain a penalty, and an obligation when it does. If two or more persons bind themselves in a bond jointly and severally, the obligee may sue them jointly or severally, but any one of the number he pleases to sue; but if they are bound jointly, and not severally, he must sue them jointly or not at all. Bonds of an immoral character are void at law. (Wharton.) [Arbitration Bond, Covenant, Defeasance, Recognizance.]

B. As adjective:

> "When mercers make more bones to swere and lye."
> Ben Jonson, i. 107.

(6) To make no bones: To swallow whole, not to scruple about doing something.

II. Technically:

1. Physiol.: A hard, dense, opaque substance used as the internal framework of man, the vertebrata and some cephalopoda, and as the external covering of several classes of animals. It is composed partly of an organic or animal, and partly of an inorganic or earthy material. In a child the earthy material is a trifle under half the weight of the bone, in an adult four-fifths, and in an old person seven-eighths. The animal part of bone consists of cartilage, with vessels, medullary membrane, and fat. Three hours' boiling will convert it into gelatine. The animal part consists of phosphate and carbonate of lime, with smaller portions of phosphate and carbonate of magnesia. The outer portion of a bone is in general compact and strong, the interior reticular, spongy, or cancellated, that is, having spaces or cells called cancelli communicating freely with each other. [CANCELLI.] The hard surface of bone is covered by a firm, tough membrane called the periosteum. [PERIOSTEUM.] In the compact tissue are vascular canals called Haversian Canals [HAVERSIAN.] There are in bone pores coalescing into a lacuna beneath. It has blood vessels and nerves. Bones may be classified into Long, Short, Flat, and Irregular. (See Todd & Bowman's Physiol. Anat., vol. i., ch. v., p. 103.) A long bone is divided into a shaft or central part and two extremities. (Hind.) There are 198 bones in the fully developed human skeleton.

2. Chem.: Bones consist partly of animal and partly of earthy matter. The former is called ossein (q.v.). It yields gelatine on being boiled. The composition of human bones, as analysed by Berzelius, is—

Animal matter soluble by boiling	32·17
Vascular substance	1·13
Calcium phosphate, with a little calcium fluoride	58·04
Calcium carbonate	11·49
Magnesium phosphate	1·16
Soda, with a little common salt	1·20
	100·00

In the other vertebrates the proportions are slightly different.

3. Pictorial.: Excepting teeth, no part of a vertebrated animal is more indestructible than bones, and these are so correlated to the teeth, digestive organs, external covering, &c., that in many cases the finding of a single bone will enable a skilled anatomist to reconstruct the whole animal.

4. Music. Pl. (Bones): Four pieces of bone taken from the ribs of horses or oxen, and struck together for the purpose of marking time in accompaniment to the voice or an instrument. Sometimes only two bones are used, or in lieu of these two small wooden staves. The instrument is probably of African origin. It existed in Egypt as far back as the Theban era. Negro minstrels still patronize it. Country people call such bones knacky-knackers (q.v.). (Scheler & Barrett.)

> "Let's have the tongs and the bones."—Shaksp. Mid. Night's Dr., iv. 1.

• 5. Weaving: A kind of bobbins made of trotter bones for weaving bobbin-lace (q.v.). (Johnson.)

6. Comm.: Bones are used in many of the arts. See example.

> "... naturally considered, the uses of bone are to turn, as ivory, handles of knives and tools, inlaid hafts, canes, etc. The term includes the ordinary bones of the body, and also the tusks and teeth of the elephant, hippopotamus, walrus, and whale. Bone is also, when deprived of its animal matter by fire, lamp-black, used as a colouring, blacking, and filtering material in the treatment of syrups and distilled liquors, and in the purification of water. Bone-black is also used as a pigment in making printers' ink. Bones, while yet fresh, is used by pastry-cooks to prepare a clear and rigid jelly. Bone is used to temper surfaces as a cushion in the hardening of steel. White bone (or enamel) is not a bone, but particles of the salts of bone. Bones is used by blacksmiths as a name for bones bleached in an open fire, reduced to the state to yield a powder which is used in making the cupels of the assayer, in making phosphorus, and as a poisoning material."—Knight's Pictor. Dict. Mechan.

B. As adjective: Of or belonging to bone.

Ichthyol.: A name given in Scotland to a fish, Rhombus vulgaris. It is called also Brill, Pearl, and Mouse-dab. (Neill: List of Fishes, p. 12. Yarrell: Brit. Fishes, &c.) bonnet-laird, bannet-laird, s. A laird or landed proprietor accustomed to wear a bonnet like a man of the humbler classes; in other words, a petty laird. A person of this description, as a rule, cultivates his own fields instead of letting them out to tenant-farmers. He is sometimes called a cock-laird. (Scotch.)

"I was unwilling to say a word about it, till I had secured the ground, for it belonged to auld Johnnie Howie, a bonnet-laird here hard by, and many a communing we had before he and I could agree."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. iv.

Zoology:

1. The English name of Pileopsis, a genus of gasteropodous molluscs belonging to the family Calyptræidæ. They are so called from their resemblance to a "bonnet" or cap.

2. In the plural:

(1) The plural of the above.

(2) The designation of the family of molluscs called Calyptræidæ. [CALYPTRÆIDÆ.]

bonnet-pepper, s.

Bot.: A species of Capsicum, the fruits of which, which are very fleshy, have a depressed form like a Scotch bonnet. In Jamaica it is esteemed more than any other Capsicum. [CAPSICUM, PEPPER.]

bonnet-piece, s. [Eng. bonnet, and piece.] A coin resembling a bonnet in shape. It was a gold coin from the mint of James V., and derived its name from the fact that the king was represented upon it wearing a bonnet.

"My purse, with bonnet-pieces full to the brim,
To him will swim a bonnet's depth over
And loose a shallop from the shore."
Scott: Lady of the Lake, vi. 23.

bonnet-pressing, a. Pressing or designed to press a bonnet whilst the latter is in process of manufacture.

Bonnet-pressing machine: A machine by which bonnets while on the forming-block are presented to the flat or presser.

bonnet-shaping, a. Shaping or designed to shape a woman's bonnet.

Bonnet-shaping machine: A machine by which a partially-shaped bonnet is pressed down upon a facing-block to give it a proper shape. One die has the exterior and the other the interior shape. One is usually heated to dry the bonnet and make it rigid in its acquired form. The principle is the same as in the hat-machine.

bŏn′-nĕt (2), bŏn′-ĕtte (O. pl. bonettes), s. [Fr. bonnette, same meaning as def. (q.v.); from Fr. bonnet = bonnet (q.v.).]

Naut.: An additional part made to fasten with latchings to the foot of the sails of small vessels with one mast, in moderate winds. It is exactly similar to the foot of the sail it is intended for. Such additions are commonly one-third of the depth of the sails they belong to. (Falconer.)  boose, s. [Bouse.] (Prompt. Parv.)

 boose, s. [Boss.]

Bood'-dha, Bûd'-dha, s. [Pali boddha = known, understood, possessing knowledge, enlightened, wise; Bouddha = the personage described in this article. Sometimes the word is spelled with one d, but this is erroneous, Buudh in Sanscrit being = not the religious teacher but the planet Mercury.]

1. Gen.: A man possessed of infinite or infallible knowledge (Childers); a deified religious teacher. There was said to be a series of them, a number having come and gone before Gautama, the personage described under No. 2. When no Boodha is on earth, the true religion gradually decays, but it flourishes in pristine vigour when a new Boodha is raised up. He is not, however, entitled at once to that honourable appellation, it is only after he has put forth arduous exertions for the faith that he attains to Boodhahood. Most of the Boodhas preceding the personage described under No. 2 appear to have been purely fabulous. His immediate predecessor, Kasyapa or Kassapo, may have been a real person.

"Sakya Muni, who is usually looked upon as the founder of Buddhism; but so far from this being the case Sakya Muni was the fourth Buddha of the actual age or second division of the Kappo."—Col. Sykes in Jour. Asiat. Soc. (1841), vol. vi., p. 561.

2. Specially: A distinguished personage of Aryan descent, whose father was king of Kapilavastu, an old Hindoo kingdom at the foot of the Nepaulese mountains, about 100 miles north of Benares: he was of the Sakhya family, and the class of the Gautamas, hence his distinguished son was often called Sakhya Muni or Saint Sakya, and Gautama or Guadama. The Chinese call him Fo, which is the name Boodha softened in the pronunciation. The Aryan invaders of India looked down with contempt upon the Turanian inhabitants of that land, and to keep their blood unmixed established a system of caste. Boodha, whose human sympathy was wide-reaching, broke through this old restraint, and though he was himself an Aryan, preached the equality of races, a doctrine which the oppressed Turanians eagerly embraced. By the common account he was born in B.C. 622, attained to Boodhahood in 580, and died in 543; or in the opinion of some in B.C. 477, and other years than these such as 406 B.C., or even lower, have been contended for. Boodha became deified by his admiring followers. Those images of an oriental god made of white marble, so frequently seen in English museums and even in private houses, are representations of Boodha.

Bood'-dha-hood, Bûd'-dha-hôod, s. [Boodha; and Eng. suffix -hood.] The state of a Boodha

Bood'-dha-ship, Bûd'-dha-ship, s. [Boodha; and Eng. suffix -ship.] The degree or condition of a Boodha

Bood'-dhism, Bûd'-dhism, s. [Sansc. & Pali Buddha (Boodha), and Eng. suff. -ism.]

Theol., Phil., & Hist: The system of faith introduced or reformed by Boodha. [Boodha.] In its origin Booddhism was a reaction against the caste-pretensions of the Brahmans and other Aryan [Aryas] invaders of India, and was therefore eminently fitted to become, as it for a long time was, the religion of the vanquished Turanians [Turanian.] As might have been anticipated, the equality of all castes was, and is, one of its most fundamental tenets. [Caste.] Another tenet is the deification of men who, when raised to Boodhahood, are called Booddhas. Professors of the faith enumerate about one hundred of these personages, but practically confine their reverence to about seven. Pre-eminent among these stands Boodha himself. Personally, he never claimed divine honours. It was his disciples who first entitled him Sakya Muni, i.e., Saint Sakya. (For other names, such as Gautama, &c., given to him, see Boodha.) As Gautama, though adored as superhuman, is after all confessedly only a deified hero, it has been disputed whether his followers can be said to admit a Supreme Intelligence, Governor of this and all worlds. In philosophy, they believe the universe to be maya, an illusion or phantom. The later Brahmanists do the same; but in the opinion of Krishna Mohun, Banerjea, and others, these latter seem to have borrowed the tenet from the Booddhists rather than the Booddhists from them. Of the six schools of Hindu philosophy, those which Booddhism most closely approaches, are the Sankhya philosophy of Kapila, and the Yoga philosophy of Patanjali. Booddhism enjoins great tenderness to animal life. The felicity at which its professors aim in the future world is called Nirvâna, or, more accurately, Nibbanam. It has been disputed whether this means annihilation or blissful repose. Mr. Robt. Caesar Childers, in his dictionary of the Pali language, uses strong arguments in favour of the former view. Booddhism was attended by an enormous development of monasticism.

The language in which Gautama or Boodha taught was the Magadhi or Pali, the language of Magadha, now called Behar or Behar. [Pali.] It was a Prâkrit or Aryan vernacular of a province, but has now been raised to the dignity of the Booddhist sacred tongue throughout the world. Gautama's followers believe that his sayings were noted down in the Tripitaka, or "Three Treasuries of Discipline, Doctrine, and Metaphysics," which constitute the Booddhist scriptures. What their real age is has been a matter of dispute; the discovery by General Cunningham, in 1874, of allusions to them in the Bharhut Sculptures, which are of date third century B.C., is in favour of their genuineness and antiquity. [Booddhist Architecture.] This work is in Pali; the Sanscrit Booddhist books discovered by Brian Hodgson in Nepaul are much more modern, and present a corrupt form of Booddhism.

The first general council of the Booddhist Church was held at Rajagriha, the capital of the Magadha kingdom, in B.C. 543; the second at Vesal (Allahabad [?], or a place near Patna) about B.C. 443 or 377 (?), and a third at Pataliputra (Gr. Palibothra = modern Patna), on the Ganges, in B.C. 307 or 250. This last one was called by Asoka, an emperor ruling over a great part of India, who had been converted to Booddhism, and is sometimes called the Constantine of that faith, having established it as the state religion of his wide realm. He sent missionaries into Western, Central, and Southern India, and also to Ceylon and to Pegu. Booddhism was dominant in India for about 1,000 years after its establishment by Asoka. Then, having become corrupt and its vitality having decayed, reviving Brahmanism prevailed over it, and all but extinguished it on the Indian continent, though a modification of it, Jainism, still exists in Marwad and many other parts. It has all along held its own, however, in Ceylon. On losing continental India, its missionaries transferred their efforts to China, which they converted, and which still remains Booddhist. The religion of Gautama flourishes also in Thibet, Burmah, and Japan, and is the great Turanian faith of the modern as of the ancient world. [Booddhists.]

The Rev. G. Smith points out resemblances between Booddhism and Roman Catholicism (these, it may be added, were first discovered by the Jesuit missionaries, who were greatly perplexed by them): "There is the monastic system, celibacy, the dress and cape of the priests, the incense, the bells, the rosary of beads, the lighted candles at the altar, the same intonations in the services, the same ideas of purgatory, the praying in an unknown tongue, the offerings to departed spirits in the temple." The closest similarity is in Lamaism, an amplification of Booddhism in Thibet. [Lamaism.] But most of the resemblances are ceremonial; there is no close similarity in doctrine between the two faiths.

"There is also something stronger than a presumption of the existence of Buddhism previous to Sakya Muni's ministry."—Col. Sykes in Jour. Asiat. Soc., vi. 261.

Bood'-dhist, Bûd'-dhist, a. & s. [Sansc., Eng., &c., Boodh(a), and Eng. suff. -ist.]

A. As adjective: Pertaining or relating to Boodhha or to Booddhism.

B. As substan.: One professing the Booddhist faith. The Booddhists are not less than from 350 to 455 millions in number, and constitute between one-fourth and one-third of the human race.

"Pali then is the language of Magadha, in which Gautama Buddha taught, and in which the sacred scriptures of the Buddhists were originally written."—Times, Dec. 2, 1874.

Booddhist architecture, s.

Arch.: A style of architecture characteristic of the Indian or other Booddhists. "There is no known specimen of architecture in India" Mr Fergusson says, "the date of which carries us beyond the third century before Christ. When the curtain rises the architecture visible is Booddhist. In 250 B.C. the great emperor Asoka introduced the first great era of Indian architecture, that of the Booddhists proper. Up till this time all erections had been wood, with him the use of stone commenced. He engraved edicts, enjoining tenderness and humanity to animals, on lats (pillars) in Cuttack, Peshawur, and Surastra, in the Dhun or Dhon, and other parts of the Himalayas and in Thibet. He built innumerable topes (mounds). [Tope.] No built temples or monasteries of Booddhist origin have come down to our times, if indeed any ever existed; but multitudes of rock-cut temples and monasteries assembled in groups have been found in Behar, Cuttack, the Bombay presidency, and elsewhere. Those of Behar which are cut in granite, are the oldest: as it is from bihar = a monastery, that Behar itself is called. Those of Cuttack followed. Those of the Bombay presidency, embracing nine-tenths of the whole, were the last; they are cut in amygdaloidal trap. The Booddhist architecture, though essentially independent, yet showed a tinge of Greek influence. It originated the Jaina system of architecture. [Jaina Architecture.] (Fergusson.)

Bood-dhis-tic, Bûd-dhis-tic, Bood-dhis-tic-al, Bûd-dhis-tic-al, a. [Eng. Booddhist; -ic, -al.] The same as Booddhist, a. (q.v.).

bôod'-le (le as el), s. (Slang, U.S.)

1. Crowd, lot.

"He would like to have the whole lot [of Mormons] . . . with their wives and children sloughed off to a remote island."—O. W. Holmes: The Autocrat.

bō'-o-it, s. [Bowet.] (Scotch.) book, * booke, * bōke, * bōe (Eng.), beuk, buik, buke, buk (Scotch), s. & a. [A.S. bóc = a book, a volume, a writing, an index; Goth. bôka; Icel. bók; Sw. bok; Dan. bog; Dut. boek; O. S. buok; (N. H.) Ger. buch; M. H. Ger. buoch; O. H. Ger. puoch. From A.S. bóc = a beech; Ger. buche = a beech (Beech), because Anglo-Saxon and German books were originally made of beech boards.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Of things material: An article of manufacture, of which a series of forms have existed in bygone ages, but which at present consists of a number of sheets of paper, paper stitched together, pressed, and covered with boards. [Bookbinding.]

¶ The first books were probably of various and diverse types. The Koran is said to have been written on shoulder-blades of sheep. The Anglo-Saxon books were originally written on pieces of beechen board. Boards of other trees were doubtless used in other countries as was the inner bark of trees. At a remote period of antiquity the papyrus Papyrus displaced its rivals, and so well held its place as to have given rise to the word paper. Parchment, called from Pergamos, where it was first made, arose about B.C. 200. [Parchment.] An early and persistent form of book was a roll of papyrus or other material. Jeremiah's book was such a roll (Jer. xxxvi. 4, 14, 27). The charred books found in Herculaneum were also rolls. This form of book is commemorated in the common word volume, which is from Lat. liber = a thing rolled or wound [illegible] as.] When books were transcribed they were necessarily very [illegible] Atto is said to have given about £ [illegible] Aristotle about £80 for [illegible] he Great, about the year B.C. [illegible] a third volume. Printing cheapened [illegible] s to an incalculable extent, though heavy prices are still given for rare and large or copiously-illustrated works. Thus Machlin's Bible, by Tomkins, was valued at £525, and a superb Bible, in fifty-four large folio volumes, with 7,000 illustrations, was raffled off for tickets in the aggregate amounting to £5,000. A collection of books is called a library. [LIBRARY.]

"Books! These poor bits of rag paper with black ink on them."—Carlyle: Heroes, Lect. v.

¶ It is not needful that a printed work shall have many pages to constitute a book, in nursery literature a single page will be enough.

"A book (to please us at a tender age
'Tis said) a book, though but a single page."
Cowper: Tirocinium.

(2) Of things intellectual:

(a) A written or printed literary composition contained in a roll, or collection of pages in boards, as described under No. 1.

(b) Any writing or paper. (In the subjoined example it means articles of agreement.)

"By that time will our book, I think, be drawn."
Shakesp.: 1 Hen. IV., iii. 1.

*(c) Pre-eminently the Bible.

"I'll be sworn on a book . . ."
Shakesp.: Merry Wives, i. 4.

†(d) An account book.

(e) A division of a treatise on any subject. Books in this sense are often subdivided into chapters. Thus in the contents of J. Stuart Mill's Logic, 2nd ed. (1846), the leading divisions and subdivisions are: Book I. Of Names and Propositions. (This is divided into eight chapters.) Book II. Of Reasoning (six chapters.) Book III. Of Induction (thirteen chapters).

2. Fig.: Anything presenting a more or less close analogy either to the material part of a book or to the writing or printing which it contains. Specially—

*(1) Heaven.

"Paraventure in thilke large books,
What that is cleped the heven, i-write was."
Chaucer: C. T., 4,610-11.

(2) (See 3, Special phrases.)

3. In special phrases:

(1) A book of remembrance was written. Fig.: There was undying remembrance. (Mal. iii. 16.)

(2) God's book: The Bible.

"Such as by God's book are adjudged to death."
Shakesp.: 2 Hen. VI., ii. 3.

(3) In the books of, or in the good books of: Remembered for something of a favourable or pleasant character.

"I was so much in his books that at his decease he left me his lamp."—Addison.

(4) In the bad books of: Remembered for something for which offence has been taken.

(5) The book: The Bible.

"Some herds, weel learn'd upo the book."
Burns: To Wm. Simpson. (Postscript.)

(6) The book of life. Fig.: A record conceived of as existing in which are written the names of those who shall ultimately obtain eternal life. (Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5; xiii. 8, &c.)

(7) Without book:

(a) Without being compelled to have recourse to a book to help the memory.

"Her friend Miss Kitty repeated, without book, the eight best lines of the play."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. xvii. Note.

(b) Without fortifying the assertion by the aid of books; without authority, loosely, inaccurately.

(8) To bring to book: To call to account.

II. Technically:

1. Mercantile affairs (pl. Books): A register of financial transactions, as of debts, assets, &c. [BOOKKEEPING.]

B. As adjective: Designed to operate upon the back of a book.

book-back [illegible] der, s.

Bookbinding: A machine which acts as a substitute for the hammer in rounding the back of a book after cutting the edge and ends. It is usually performed upon the book before the cover is put on. In one form of machine, the book is run between rollers, being pressed forward by a rounded strip which rests against the front edge and determines the form thereof. In another form, the book is clamped and a roller passed over the back under great pressure. Another form of machine is for moulding the back-covers of books to a given curvature, by pressing between a heated cylinder of a given radius and a bed-plate whose curvature corresponds to the presser. (Knight.) book-binder, s. [BOOKBINDER.]

book-bosomed, a. Having a book in the bosom.

"As the corslet off he took,
The Dwarf espied the Mighty Book!
Much he marvelled, a knight of pride
Like a book-bosomed priest should ride."
Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, iii. 9.

book-canvasser, s. One who solicits subscribers for books (generally in serial form).

2. Of things: A contrivance of the nature of a temporary cover, for holding together newspapers, pamphlets, or similar articles.

† book-bind-ĕr-y, s. [Eng. book; bindery.] A place for binding books.

book-bind-ing, s. [Eng. book; binding.] The art of stitching or otherwise fastening together and covering the sheets of paper or similar material composing a book. The edge of a modern book constituted by the margin of the paper composing it is called the binding-edge.

☞ When books were literal "volumes," or rolls, the way of "binding" them, if it could be so called, or at least of keeping them together, was to unroll them from one end to the other and roll each again, as it was perused, on another. When books became separate folios the first method of dealing with them seems to have been the tying them together by a string passed through a hole at the margin of the pile. This is still done in the south of India and Ceylon with writing on talipot or other palm leaves. The holding together of folios of a literary man's manuscript by a small clasp at one edge is an essentially similar device. The present method of binding seems to have been invented by or under Attalus, king of Pergamus, or his son Eumenes, about 200 B.C. The oldest bound book known—the binding was ornamental—is the volume of St Cuthbert, about A.D. 650. Ivory was used for book covers in the eighth century; oak in the ninth. The Book of Evangelists, on which the English kings took their coronation oath, was bound in oak boards, A.D. 1100. Velvet, silk, bogskin, and leather were used as early as the 15th century; needlework binding began in 1471; vellum, stamped and ornamented, about 1510; leather about the same date, and calf in 1550. Cloth binding superseded the paper known in England as "boards" in 1823; india-rubber backs were introduced in 1841, tortoise-shell sides in 1856.

The chief processes of bookbinding are the following. Folding the sheets; gathering the consecutive signatures; rolling the packs of folded sheets; sewing, after sawcutting the backs for the cords; rounding the backs and glueing them; edge-cutting; binding, securing the book to the sides: covering the sides and back with leather, muslin, or paper, as the case may be; tooling and lettering; and, finally, edge-gilding. Books may be full bound, i.e., with the back and sides leather, or half-bound, that is, with the back leather and the sides paper or cloth.

"About three months after his engagement with De la Roche, Farnaby quitted him and bookbinding together."—Tyndall: Prag. of Science, 3rd ed., xii. 351.

book'-case, s. [Eng. book; case.] A case furnished with shelves for holding books.

book'-kēep-ĕr, s. [Eng. book; keeper.] One who, as accountant, secretary, or clerk, keeps books, making the requisite entries in them day by day.

"Here, brother, you shall be the book-keeper:
This is the argument of that they show."
Kyd: Spanish Tragedy.

book'-kēep-ĭng, s. [Eng. book; keeping.]

1. Arithm. & Comm.: The art of keeping books in which the pecuniary transactions are so unremittingly and so accurately entered that one is able at any time to ascertain the exact state of his financial affairs or of any portion of them with clearness and expedition. This art, in a certain undeveloped state, must have existed from immemorial antiquity, but it received such improvement and impulse at Venice as to make that comparatively modern city to be considered its birthplace. The first known writer on bookkeeping was Lucas di Borgo, who published a treatise on the subject in Italian in 1495. It is generally divided into bookkeeping by single and bookkeeping by double entry. In the former every entry is single, i.e., is placed to the debit or credit of a single account, while in the latter it is double, that is, it has both a debtor and creditor account. In other words, by single entry each transaction is entered only once in the ledger, and by double entry twice. Bookkeeping by single entry is imperfect, and is scarcely fitted even for very limited establishments. Many shopkeepers having recourse to it have simply a waste-book and a journal, the former used as a receptacle for transactions of all kinds, the latter for those to a certain extent classified. In other cases a cash-book also is used. Bookkeeping by double entry being first practised in Venice, Genoa, and the adjacent towns, is often called the Italian method. In bookkeeping by double entry there is no waste-book, all transactions inwards falling under four heads: cash, bills, book-debts, and stock. There are, moreover, a cash-book, a bill-book, a book for book-debts—called the sold ledger—and a book for the record of stock, that is, stock in hand. To the bought book for debts receivable corresponds the bought ledger for debts payable. There are various other books in a large establishment. In smaller establishments it is enough to have a cash-book, a day or waste-book, a journal, and a ledger. It is in the ledger that the elaborate classification of all transactions is entered. The ability to make out a balance-sheet is much increased by the simple device of making impersonal entries, that is, entering cash, iron, &c., as if they were mercantile traders, and grouping a number of articles together under the heading sundries. Then there are accounts of the form sundries debtor to cash, or cash debtor to sundries. If a merchant have purchased iron, what he has paid for it is debited to iron which is expected to meet it when the metal is disposed of, and so with every other expense incurred by the firm for purposes of business.

Sometimes instead of bookkeeping by single or that by double entry, there is a combination of the two called mixed entry. [Bill-book, Cash-book, Day-book, Ledger.]

2. Sarcastically: The practice of not returning books which one has borrowed. (Colloq.)

* book'-land, * bōck'-land, s. & a. [Bock-land.]

book'-lĕss, a. [Eng. book; -less.] Without book. Used—

BOOMERANG.

the lowest in intelligence of any tribe or race of mankind. It is a curved stick, round on one side and flat on the other, about three feet long, two inches wide, and three-quarters of an inch thick. It is grasped at one end and thrown sickle-wise, either upward into the air, or downward so as to strike the ground at some distance from the thrower. In the first case it flies with a rotatory motion, as its shape would indicate, and after ascending to a great height in the air, it suddenly returns in an elliptical orbit to a spot near its starting-point. On throwing it downward to the ground, it rebounds in a straight line, pursuing a ricochet motion until it strikes the object at which it is thrown. The most singular curve described by it is when it is projected upward at an angle about 45°, when its flight is always backward, and the native who throws it stands with his back to the object he intends to hit. (b) To write booty: To write in such a way as intentionally to fail in gaining one's professed aim.

"I have set this argument in the best light, that the ladies may not think that I write booty."—Dryden.

¶ Precise meaning of booty: Crabb thus distinguishes between booty, spoil, and prey:—"The first two are used as military terms or in attacks on an enemy, the latter in cases of particular violence. The soldier gets his booty; the combatant his spoils; the carnivorous animal his prey. Booty respects what is of personal service to the captor; spoils whatever serves to designate his triumph; prey includes whatever gratifies the appetite and is to be consumed. When a town is taken, soldiers are too busy in the work of destruction and mischief to carry away much booty; in every battle the arms and personal property of the slain enemy are the lawful spoils of the victor; the hawk pounces on his prey, and carries him up to his nest. Greediness stimulates to take booty; ambition produces an eagerness for spoils; a ferocious appetite impels to a search for prey." (Crabb: Eng. Syn.)

Bot.: The English name of the genus Borago. [BORAGO.] The common borage is an exceedingly hispid plant, with large, brilliant, blue flowers, having their stamens exserted. It was once regarded as a cordial; the young leaves may be used as a salad or potherb, and the flowers form an ingredient in cool tankards.

bŏr'-age-wŏrts (age as ĭj), s. pl. [Eng., &c., borage, and suffix -worts.]

Bot.: The English name of the Botanical order Boraginaceæ (q.v.).

bŏr ăj in-ā'-ŏē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. borago, genit. boraginis, and -aceæ, nom. fem. pl. of adj. suffix -aceus.]

Bot. (Borageworts): An order of plants placed by Lindley under his 48th or Echeal Alliance. They have monopetalous corollas, generally with five, but sometimes with four, divisions, five stamens, a four-parted, four-seeded variously producing, when ripe, four nutlets or less each other. Leaves generally rough. Whilst the five stamens ally them to the Convolvulaceæ, and other allied orders, their seeds bring them near Labiatæ. They are natives principally of the temperate parts of the northern hemisphere. [illegible] species were known in 1847. (Lindley.) The [illegible] tives of the order in Britain are [illegible] Pulmonaria, Lithospermum, Myosotis, Borago, Symphytum, Lycopsis, Anchusa, Myosotis, Asperugo, Echinospermum, Cynoglossum.

bŏr-ăs-ŏīd, s. [From Gr. βοράσσος (borassos) = the fruit of a palm-tree.]

Bot.: A genus of palms, constituting a type of the section Borasseæ. It consists of Borassus flabelliformis, or Palmyra or Palm, called also the Tree. It grows in the East Indies to the height of about thirty feet. It is [illegible] elevated and fully situated. The fruit is about the size and shape of a child's [illegible] Wine and sugar are made from the sap of the trunk.

bŏr'-āte, s. [Eng. bor(ic), and suff. -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of boric acid.

bŏr'-ăx,  bor ax, s. [In Fr. borax, sc. borrax; Ital. borrace; Arab. burag, from baraqa = to shine.]

1. Chem.: Biborate of sodium, sodium pyroborate, $Na_2B_4O_7$. It is found native in Thibet, California, and Peru, and is also artificial; it is also obtained by boiling the native Tincean boric acid with half its weight of Na_2Co_3. It crystallizes at 70° in octahedra $Na_2B_4O_7.5H_2O$; and below 50° in monoclinic prisms, $Na_2B_4O_7.10H_2O$. When heated in air it swells up and loses its water, forming a spongy mass. The aqueous solution of borax has a slight alkaline reaction, turning yellow turmeric paper brown.

2. Pharm.: Borax acts as a mild alkali on the alimentary canal and produces diuresis; it has a peculiar topical sedative action on the mucous membranes, and is used as a gargle in aphthous conditions of the mouth and throat, and in cases of mercurial salivation.

3. Manuf.: Borax is used in the process of soldering oxidizable metals; to the spot placed over their surface it fuses and dissolves the oxide which would prevent adhesion. It is used for fixing colours on porcelain.

"Borax, cerussa, ne oille of tartre ..."
Chaucer: C. T. Prol., 67

4. Mineralogy: A monoclinic mineral, rather brittle, sweetish alkaline mineral, with a hardness of 2—2·5, a sp. gr. of 1·716, a [illegible] or earthy lustre, a greyish, [illegible] white colour. Composition: [illegible] soda, 15·2; water, 47·2. It occurs [illegible] tincal, borate of soda, chrys[illegible] first in a salt lake in Thibet [illegible] wards in Ceylon, California, Canada, [illegible] bör-ic, a. [Eng., &c., boron(); -ic.] Contained in or derived from boron (q.v.).

boric acid, boracic acid, s.

1. Chem.: Boric acid, or orthoboric acid, $BO(OH)_3$, is formed by dissolving boron tri oxide (B_2O_3) in water. It occurs in the steam which issues from volcanic vents in Tuscany called soffioni, or fumaroles. These are directed into artificial lagoons, the water of which becomes charged with boric acid, and it is obtained from it by evaporation. Boric acid is supposed to be formed by the action of water on BN (nitride of boron), which is decomposed by it into boric acid and ammonia. Boric acid crystallises out in six-sided lamine, which are soluble in hot water and in alcohol; it forms salts and borates which are very unstable as $Mg_3(BO_3)_2$ (magnesium orthoborate), being a tribasic acid. Its solution in water burns with a green-edged flame. Boric acid turns blue to litmus even in the presence of free hydrochloric acid; the brown colour thus formed is turned ... by caustic soda. Pyroboric acid, $H_2B_4O_7$, is obtained by heating for a long time the crystals of orthoboric acid at 140° C. Its chief salts are borax, $Na_2B_4O_7$, sodium pyroborate, and CaB_2O_4, calcium pyroborate, which occurs as the mineral boracite. Metaboric acid, HBO_2, is formed when boric acid is heated to 100°; it is a white powder. Its salts are called metaborates, as, barium metaborate, $Ba(BO_2)_2$, and calcium metaborate, $Ca(BO_2)_2$, a white powder precipitated when $CaCl_2$ is added to a solution of borax; the calcium salt is soluble in acetic acid, and in NH_4Cl.

2. Min.: A mineral, called also Sassolite (q.v.).

bor-ick-ite, s. [From Borickv, who analysed it.]

Min.: A reddish-brown opaque mineral of waxy lustre, occurring reniform or massive. It contains phosphoric acid 19·35, 29·60, sesquioxide of iron, 52·23, 52·99, water, 19·06, 19·01, lime, 7·20, ... 16, and magnesia 0·06, 0·01. It occurs in Styria and Bohemia. (Dana.) bor-il-ia, s. [Etymology doubtful.]

Metal.: A rich copper ore in dust.

bor-ing, *bor yngge, *bor-i-inde, pr. par. ...

A. & B. As present participle & ... participial adjective: In senses corresponding to ... of the verb.

C. As substantive:

1. The act, operation, or process of perforating wood, iron, rocks, or other hard substances by means of instruments adapted for the purpose.

> "Bor ynge or bereynge. P. Swerde." — Prompt. Parv.

2. A place made by boring, or where boring operations are in progress.

3. Pl.: Chips or fragments which drop from a hole which is in the process of being bored.

boring and tenoning machine, s.

Wheelwrighting: A machine adapted to bore the holes in the felloes and to cut the tenons on the ends of the spokes.

Metal-working:

1. A bar supported axially in the bore of a piece of ordnance or cylinder, and carrying the cutting tool, which has a traversing motion, and turns off the inside as the gun or cylinder rotates.

2. A cutter-stock used in other boring-machines, such as those for boring the brasses of pillow blocks. (Knight.) boring-bench, s.

Wheelwrighting: A bench fitted for the use of boring mach nery or appliances. [Bench, II. 1.]

bor...ng-t..., s. A tool adapted to be used in a brace ... has various forms, enumerated under the head of Bit (q.v.).

Metal-working: A slotted block on which work to be bored is placed.

boring-collar, s. A back-plate provided with a number of tapering holes, either of which may be brought in line with a piece to be bored and which is chucked to the lathe-mandrel. The end of the piece is exposed at the hole to a boring-tool which is held against it. (Knight.) boring faucet, s. One which has a bit on its end by which it may cut its own way through the head of a cask.

boring-gage, s. A clamp to be attached to an auger or a bit-shank at a given distance from the point, to limit the penetration of the tool when it has reached the determinate depth. (Knight.) boring-instruments, s. [BORING-MACHINES.]

boring-lathe, s. A lathe used for boring wheels or short cylinders. The wheel or cylinder is fixed on a large chuck screwed to the mandrel of a lathe.

boring-machines, s. pl. Machines by which holes are made by the revolution of the tool or of the object around the tool, but not including the simple tool itself. Thus an augur, gimlet, awl, or any bit adapted for boring, independently of the machinery for driving it, would not be a boring-machine. A brace is on the dividing line, if such there be, but is not included under the term boring-machines. (Knight.) boring mollusca, s. The principal boring molluscs are the Teredo, which perforates timber, and Pholas, which bores into chalk, clay, and sandstone. These shells are supposed to bore by mechanical means, either by the foot or by the valves. But certain shells, as Lithodomus, Gastrochæna, Saxicava, and Ungulina, which attack the hardest marble and the shells of other molluscs, have smooth valves and a small foot, and have a limited power of movement—(the Saxicava is even fixed in its crypt by a byssus)—so they have been supposed either to dissolve the rock by chemical means, or else to wear it away with the thickened anterior margins of the mantle. The boring mollusks have been called "stone-eaters" (lithophagi), and "wood-eaters" (xylophagi), and some at least are obliged to swallow the material produced by their operations, though they derive no nourishment from it. No boring mollusk deepens or enlarges its burrow after attaining the full growth usual to its species. The animals do great injury to ships, piers, and breakwaters.

boring-rod, s. An instrument used in boring for water, &c. [BORING-MACHINES.]

boring-table, s. The platform of a boring-machine on which the work is laid.

Metal-working: A cutting-tool placed in a cutter-head to dress round holes.

* borith, s. [BURYT.] (Bailey.)

bork-hau'-si-a, s. [Named after Moritz Borkhausen, a German, who published a botanical work in 1790.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Asteraceæ (Compositæ) and the sub-order Ligulifloræ (Cichoraceæ). The British flora contains two wild species, Borkhausia fœtida, the fetid, and B. taraxifolia, the small, rough Borkhausia, besides an introduced species, B. setosa. They are not common, and no special interest attaches to them.

bor-la'-si-a, s. [From the Rev. Dr. Borlase, F.R.S., an English naturalist and antiquarian, born in Cornwall, on February 2nd, 1695, and died there August 31st, 1772.]

Z.: A Ribbon Worm, belonging to the family Nemertidæ. It is found on the coasts of Britain and France; is of nocturnal habits, and attains the length of fifteen feet.

I. Of born and the other forms given above: Brought into the world, brought into life, brought forth, produced. (Used either of the simple fact of birth or of the circumstances attendant upon it.)

¶ (1) Formerly all the foregoing forms were used except born, which is modern.

"For he was yborn at Rome. . . ."—Rob. Glouc. p. 96.

"How he had lyued syn he was bore"
Robt. Manning of Brunne, 5,646.

"Whanne Jhesus was borun in Bethleem, . . ."—Wycliffe (Purvey), Matt. ii. 1.

(2) Now born alone is used, complete distinction in meaning having been established between it and borne II. (2).

"These six were born unto him in Hebron."—1 Chron. iii. 4.

¶ Special phrase. Born again: Caused to undergo the new birth; regenerated, transformed in character, imbued with spiritual life.

II. Of the forms borne and * born: Carried, supported, sustained.

¶ * (1) Formerly: Of the form born, now quite obsolete in this sense.

". . . to have born up and sustained themselves so long under such fierce assaults, as Christianity hath done?"—Tillotson (3rd ed., 1723), vol. i., ser. xx.

(2) Now: Only of the form borne.

Gold burnyd: Burnished with gold.

bör'-nē-ēne, s. [Eng., &c., Borné(o); -ene.] Camphor oil of Borneo, $C_{10}H_{16}$. An oily liquid extracted from the Dryobalanops camphora, and isomeric with oil of turpentine. It can also be obtained from oil of valerian by fractional distillation. Borneene is almost insoluble in water, and has the odour of turpentine.

Bör-né-ō, s. & a. [From Brunai, the local name for the capital of the kingdom of Borneo proper.]

A. As substantive: An island, about 800 miles long by 700 broad, in the Eastern Archipelago, between 7° 4′ and 4° 10′ S. lat. and 108° 50′ and 119° 20′ E. long.

B. As adjective: Growing in Borneo; in any way connected with Borneo.

Borneo camphor, s. A gum, called also BORNEOL (q.v.).

bör'-nē-ōl, s. [From Borneo(o), and (alcoh)ol.]

Chemistry: Borneol, or Borneo camphor, $C_{10}H_{17}(OH)$, occurs in the trunks of a tree growing in Borneo, the Dryobalanops camphora. It has been prepared by the action of sodium or of alcoholic potash on common camphor. Borneol is a monad alcohol, forming ethers. When heated with HCl in a sealed tube $C_{10}H_{17}Cl$ (camphyl chloride) is formed. By heating borneol with P_2O_5 it is converted into a hydrocarbon borneene ($C_{10}H_{16}$). Borneol forms small transparent crystals, smelling like camphor and pepper; melting at 198°, and boiling at 212°. Its alcoholic solution is dextrogyrary. Heated with nitric acid it is converted into ordinary camphol.

bör'-nē-şite, s. [From Borneo (q.v.).]

Chem.: $O.N.C_7H_{13}O_6$, a crystalline substance melting at 175°. It occurs in Borneo caoutchouc.

bör'-nine, s. [In Ger., &c., bocnine; from Von Born, an eminent mineralogist of the eighteenth century.]

Min.: A mineral, called also Tetradymite (q.v.).

¶ The British Museum Catalogue calls this also Bornite, but Dana limits the latter term to a perfectly distinct mineral.

* born'-ing rod, s. [BONING ROD.]

bör'-nite, s. [In Ger. bornit. Named after Von Born.] [BORNINE.]

Min.: An isometric, brittle mineral, occurring massive, granular, or compact. The hardness is 3, the sp. gr. 4·4—5·5, the lustre metallic, the colour between red and brown, the streak pale greyish-black, slightly shining. Composition: Copper, 50·—71; sulphur, 21·4—28·24; iron, 6·41—18·3. It is a valuable ore of copper found in Cornwall, where the miners call it horse-flesh ore; at Rou Island in Killarney, in Ireland; in Norway, Germany, Hungary, Siberia, and North and South America. (Dana.) [BORNINE.]

* bor-nȳn, v.t. [O. Fr. burnir = to burnish.] [BURN, v.] To burnish. (Prompt. Parv.)

* bor-nyst, pa. par. [BURNISHED.] (Ear. Eng. Allit. Poems (ed. Morris); Pearl, 77.)

bör-ō-cāl'-çite, s. [Eng., &c., boro(n), calc(ium), and -ite.]

Min.: The same as Boronatrocalcite; Ulexite (q.v.).

bör'-ōn, s. [From borax (q.v.).]

Chemistry: A triatomic element, symbol B, At. Wt. 11. It occurs in nature combined in the form of boracic acid (BOH_3), and as borax. Boron is obtained by fusing boracic acid, B_2O_3, with sodium. It is a colourless, odorous, brown powder, a non-conductor of electricity; it is slightly soluble in water, permanent in the air; burnt in chlorine gas it forms boron chloride BCl_3, a volatile, fuming liquid, boiling at 18·23, sp. gr. 1·35, which is decomposed by water into boracic acid and hydrochloric acid. When amorphous boron is heated with aluminium the boron dissolves in it, and separates out as the metal cools. If aluminium is removed by caustic soda it crystallizes in monoclinic octohedra, which scratch ruby and corundum, but are scratched by the diamond; the sp. gr. is 2·68. Heated in oxygen it ignites, and is covered with a coating of brown trioxide. Amorphous boron fused with nitrate of potassium, explodes. Boron forms one oxide B_2O_3, obtained by heating boric acid to redness; it forms a glass, hygroscopic, transparent solid, volatile at white heat. It dissolves metallic oxides, yielding coloured beads (see Borax). Boron unites with fluorine, forming a colourless gas BF_3, having a great affinity for water. It carbonizes organic bodies; 700 volumes are soluble in one volume of water. It has no fusing liquid. Amorphous boron combines directly with nitrogen, forming boron nitride BN, a light amorphous white powder, which, heated in a current of steam, yields ammonia and boric acid.

bör-ō-nā-trō'-cal-çite, s. [Eng., &c. boro(n); natro(n); calcite.]

Min.: The same as Ulexite (Dana) (q.v.).

bör-ō'-nī-a, s. [Named after Francis Boroni, an Italian servant of Dr. Sibthorp, the botanist and traveller in Greece.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the order Rutaceæ (Rueworts). The species are pretty little Australian plants, flowering all the year, and generally sweet scented.

bör-ō-sil'-i-cāte, s. [Eng., & silicate.]

Borosilicate of lime: A compound consisting of a borate and a silicate.

Min.: The same as Datolite (q.v.).

A. As substantive:

I. In England:

1. Formerly:

(1) Gen.: A town, a city.

"Notheles thanne thai prikede faste til thai wer passed the borwgh."—Sir Ferumbras, Herrtage's ed., 1,737.

In sense I. 1 (1) it might be used of foreign towns and cities.

"Within the burgh and the samnit was sesed at Troye
The borgh brittened and brent . . ."
Sir Isaw and the Gr Knight, l. 2.

• (2) Spec.: A walled town or other fortified place, also a castle.

2. Now: A town, corporate or not, which sends a burgess or burgesses to Parliament.

"For you have the whole borough, with all its lowrankings and scandal-mongerics, contentions and contentments."—Corbyle Satire Rescrius, bk. ii., ch. 2.

II. In Scotland (the form burgh being generally used):

1. An incorporated town.

2. In the same sense as I. 2.

III. In Ireland: The same as in England.

" . . . all the cities and boroughs in Ireland."—Macaulay Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

IV. In the United States: An incorporated town or village.

B. As adjective: Pertaining or belonging to or in any way connected with a borough. [See the subjoined compounds.]

borough-court, s. A court of very limited jurisdiction, held in particular burghs or suburbs for convenience sake, by prescription, charter, or Act of Parliament. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii. 6.)

borough English, borough-english, s. [Called English (as opposed to Norman) because it came from the Anglo-Saxons, and borough because prevalent in various ancient boroughs (Blackstone).] A custom existent in some places by which on the death of a father the youngest son inherits the estate to the exclusion of his older brothers. Similarly, if the owner die without issue, his youngest brother obtains the property (Blackstone: Comm., i., Introd., § 3; Cowel, &c.)

" . . . and therefore called borough-english."—Blackstone Commenta. Introd., § 3.

Old Eng. Antiq.:

1. A pledge or security given by ten freeholders, with their families, for the good conduct of each other; a frank-pledge. [See No. 2. See also Frank-pledge.] [Borrowe.]

2. The association of ten freeholders, with their families, giving such a pledge. According to Jo[illegible] this system of giving frankpledge was introduced into England by King Alfred, having already, however, existed in Denmark, and for a long time before in Germany. Those associated together were bound to hand up, on demand, any offender existing in their community. The organisation was often called a tithing, its head was denominated head-borough or borough-head, or borsholder, i.e., boroughs elder, and was supposed to be the discreetest man in the fraternity. (Blackstone: Comment, Introd., § 4.) Ten such tithings made a "hundred."

• bor'-ow (1), s. [Borough (1).] A borough, a city.

• bor'-ow (2). • bor'-owe, s. [Borrow, s.] (Spenser: Moth. Hub. Tale, 851.)

• bor'-radh, s. [Borra.] (Scotch.) bor'-rąl treĕ, s. An expression of doubtful origin and meaning. The suggestion that it is the same as Bourtree (q.v.) is due to Dr. Jamieson; it has been generally adopted, though there is no evidence for it.

"Round the auld borral tree,
Or bourock by the burn side."
Hogg: Brownie of Bodsbeck, i. 216-17.

• bor'-rĕl, • bor'-ĕll, • bor'-rĕll, s. & a. [Old Fr. burel = a kind of coarse woollen cloth; Low. Lat. burellus = the cloth now described. Compare Fr. bure, burat = drugget; Prov. burel = brown.]

"... that eminent Botanologer, . . ."—Brown: Garden of Cyrus.

 bŏt-an-ŏl-ō-gy, s. [Gr. βοτανολογία (botanologia) = to gather herbs.] A discourse regarding plants. (Bailey.) Now superseded by the term botany (q.v.).

 bŏt-an-ō-măn-cy, s. [In Gr. βοτανομαντεία (botanomanteia); βοτάνη (botanē) = grass, fodder, and μαντεία (manteia) = divination.] Divination by means of herbs, especially by means of sage (Salvia) or by fig leaves. The inquirer wrote his name and the question he wished answered on the leaves. Afterwards he exposed these to the wind, which blew some of them away. Those which remained were then collected, and the letters written on each were placed together, so as, if possible, to bring coherent sense out of them, and any sentence constructed out of them was supposed to be the reply sought for.

"... the numberless forms of impostu e or ignorance called kapnomancy, pyromancy, and onomancy, libanomancy, botan, omancy, kephalonomancy," &c.—Smith: Dict. of the Bible, i. 442.

bŏt-an-y, s. & a. [Gr. βοτάνη (botanē) = grass, fodder, βόσκω (boskō) = to feed, to tend cattle or sheep.]

A. As substan.: The science which treats of plants. It embraces a knowledge of their names, their external and internal organizations, their anatomy and physiology, their qualities, their uses, and their distribution over the world, with the laws by which this distribution is regulated, or the geological occurrences by which it has been brought about.

History: From the remotest antiquity plants must have been at least looked at, and to a certain extent studied; and it is reported in Scripture regarding Solomon, that "he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall" (1 Kings iv. 33). If his sayings on that subject were put in writing they have perished; the first important scientific notices regarding plants which have reached our time are in Aristotle's Inquiries Concerning Animals, about B.C. 347. Theophrastus, who succeeded him in B.C. 324, gave great attention to plants, knowing, however, it is said, only about 305. Pliny, among the Romans, was also interested in botanical study, as in natural history generally. The Arabs gave some attention to botany; but up to the year A.D. 1231, according to Sprengel, only about 1,400 plants were known. After the revival of letters, Conrad Gesner, who died in 1565, collected materials and made drawings for a history of plants. Matthew Lobel, a Dutchman at the court of Queen Elizabeth, attempted a natural classification of plants, and some of his orders are still retained. Cæsalpinus, a Roman physician attached to the court of Pope Sextus VI., made various botanical discoveries. About A.D. 1650, the microscope began to be used for the examination of plants. Grew and Malpighi flourished in the same century; and in 1686 Ray published the first volume of his Systema Plantarum. About 1735, Linnæus gave to the world his celebrated Systema Naturæ, the botanical portion of which contains his artificial system, which is even now obsolescent rather than obsolete. As a rule, his classes were founded on the number, position, &c., of the stamens, and his orders on the number and character of the pistils. He founded twenty-four classes, viz., (1) Monandria, (2) Diandria, (3) Triandria, (4) Tetrandria, (5) Pentandria, (6) Hexandria, (7) Heptandria, (8) Octandria, (9) Enneandria, (10) Decandria, (11) Dodecandria, (12) Icosandria, (13) Polyandria, (14) Didynamia, (15) Tetradynamia, (16) Monadelphia, (17) Diadelphia, (18) Polyadelphia, (19) Syngenesia, (20) Gynandria, (21) Monœcia, (22) Diœcia, (23) Polygamia, and (24) Cryptogamia. (See these words for further details, and for the orders into which the several classes are divided.) Besides his artificial system of classification Linnæus attempted a natural one. In 1789, Antoine Laurent de Jussieu published his Genera Plantarum, in which, following in the direction in which Lobel, Ray, and Linnæus himself had led, he elaborated a natural system, the essential features of which are still retained. In Lindley's Vegetable Kingdom, published in 1847, the classification is as follows: Class I. Thallogens, II. Acrogens, III. Rhizogens, IV. Endogens, V. Dictyogens, VI. Gymnogens, and VII. Exogens.

Modern botany, or phytology, as it is sometimes called, comprises a number of subordinate sciences.

Lindley, in the main following Decandolle, divided it into: Organography, or explanation of the exact structure of plants; Vegetable Physiology, or the history of vital phenomena which have been observed in them; Glossology, formerly called Terminology, or a definition of the adjective terms used in botany and phytography, or an exposition of the rules to be observed in describing and naming plants (Introd. to Bot., 3rd ed., 18, 9, Pref.). All these are introductory to Systematic Botany, which is the classification and description of the several classes, orders, families, genera, species, varieties, &c., of plants in regular arrangement.

Thome, author of the recognised text-book of botany in use in the technical schools of Germany, divides the science into: I. Morphology, or the Comparative Anatomy of Plants; II. Physiology, which is concerned with their vital phenomena; III. Botanical Geography; IV. Palæophytology; V. Vegetable Palæontology; VI. Classification of Plants; and VII. Practical or Applied Botany.

Robt. Brown, jun., in his Manual of Botany, published in 1874, divides it into: I. General Anatomy or Histology of Plants: 1. Organography, 2. Morphology, 3. Organogenesis, 4. Phytotomy; II. Physiological Botany; III. Vegetable Chemistry; IV. Nosology, or Vegetable Pathology; V. Teratology, a study of abnormalities; VI. Taxology, Taxonomy, Classification, or Systematic Botany: 1. Terminology, 2. Glossology; VII. Phytogeography; VIII. Palæophytology, Geological Botany, Vegetable Palæontology, or Fossil Botany; IX. Medical Botany; X. Agricultural Botany; XI. Horticultural Botany; and XII. Industrial Botany. (See these terms. See also PLANT, VEGETABLE KINGDOM, &c. &c.)

B. As adjective: In which good botany exists, in which interesting plants abound. [BOTANY-BAY.]

Botany Bay, s. & a. [So called from the number of new plants discovered there when Captain Cook's party landed in 1770.]

A. As subst.: An inlet of the sea five miles long and broad, about seven miles north of Sydney Heads in New South Wales.

B. As adj.: Growing at or in any other way connected with Botany Bay. (See the compounds which follow.)

Botany Bay Kino: A gum which exudes from the bark of an Australian tree, Eucalyptus resinifera, and other species of the genus. It is an astringent. It has properties like those of Catechu or Kino.

Botany-Bay Pea: The English name of the Smilax glycophylla, an evergreen climbing-plant, with three-nerved leaves, and petioles with tendrils.

bō-tär-gō, s. [Sp. botarga = a kind of pantaloons, the dress of lark-pies; harlequin himself; a sort of sausage. Contracted from botalarga = a large leather bag.] A relishing sort of food, being a sausage made of the roes of the mullet fish, and eaten with oil and vinegar. It is much used on the coasts of the Mediterranean as an incentive to drink.

▼ The French editor of Rabelais says—

"In Provence, they call boutargues the hard roe of the mullet, pickled with oil and vinegar. The mullet (muge) is a fish which is eaten about the middle of December, the hard roes of it . . . [illegible] against Lent, and this is what is called bo rgo . . . a sort of caudron (puddings), which have nothing to recommend them but their exciting of thirst."

"Because he was naturally flegmatic, he began his meal with some dozens of gammons, dried neats' tongues, botargos, sausages, and such other forerunners of wine."—Ozell: Rabelais, b. i., ch. 21.

"Botcpe, anchovies, puffins too, to taste
The Moroccan wine is, all beside those best."
Skelt. Clarastella, in Reynolds's Quintus. of Poetry, vol. ii., p. 46. (Nares.) bō-tā'u-rūs, s. [From bos = an ox, and taurus = a bull, a fanciful origin invented to account for the O. Fr. and Mid. Eng. form botor.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds belonging to the family Ardeidæ or Herons, and the sub-family Ardeinæ or True Herons. It contains the Bitterns. [BITTERN.]

• bŏt'-eard, s. [Etym. not apparent; probably a corruption of or miswriting for battart (q.v.).] A kind of artillery used in the time of James V. (Scotch.)

"Two great cannon thrown in without Mow and her Marrow with two great Botcards."—Pitscottie, p. 144. (Jamieson.) bŏtçh (1), • booch-in, • booch-yn, • booch-en, v.t. [In Dut. botsen = to knock, dash, strike against, clash with; from O. L. Ger. botzen = (1) to strike or beat, (2) to repair.]

I. Lit.: To patch in any way. (Wycliffe: 2 Chron., xxxiv.)

2. Fig.: To put together clumsily

"Go with me to my house,
And hear thou there how many fruitless pranks
This ruffian hath botch'd up, that thou thereby Mayst smile at this."
Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, iv. 1.

"And botch the words up fit to their own thoughts."
Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 5.

bŏtçh (2), v.t. [From botch (2), s. (q.v.).] To mark with botches.

"Young Hylas, botch'd with stains too foul to name,
In cradle her renews his youthful frame."
Garth.

bŏtçh (1), • botçhe (1), s. [From botch, v. (q.v.).]

1. A patch.

2. A part of any work ill-finished, so as to appear worse than the rest.

"With him
To leave no rubs or botches in the work, Fleance, his son, must embrace the fate."
Shakesp.: Macbeth, iii. 1.

3. A part clumsily added.

"If both those words are not notorious botches. . . ."
—Dryden.

"A comma ne'er could claim
A place in any British name
Yet, making here a perfect botch, Thrusts your poor vowel from his notch."
Swift.

bŏtçh (2), • botçhe (2), • behoche, • booche, • booche, • boche, • boshe, s. [Fr. bosse; O. Fr. boce = (1) the boss of a buckler; (2) a bott; a boil.] A swelling of an ulcerous character anything similar on the skin; a scab, a boil.

"Bohche, sore (botche, P.). Ulcus, Cath."—Prompt. Parv.

bŏtçh'-ĕr (1), • bŏtçh'-ar, • bŏtçh'-are, • bŏchchare, s. & a. [Eng. botch (1), v.; -er.]

A. As substantive: A mender of old things, especially clothes; an inferior kind of tailor.

"Botchare of olde thinges. Resarcitor."—Prompt. Parv.

"Botchers left old cloaths in the lurch,
And fell to turn and patch the church."
Hudibras.

". . . a botcher's cushion. . . ."—Shakesp.: Coriol., ii. 1.

B. As adjective: Bungling, unskilful

"Bochchare, or vncraftly (botchar, P.). Inars. C. F."
—Prompt. Parv.

bŏtçh'-ĕr (2), s. [Eng. botch (2), s., from the spotted appearance of the skin.] A young salmon; a grilse.

"Formerly grilse, botchers, were far more plentiful than they have been since the passing of the Fishery Laws."—Times, 24th, 25th, 1875.

• bŏtçh'-ĕr-ly, a. [Eng. botcher; -ly.] Like the work of a botcher, patched in a clumsy way; blundered.

"Publishing some botcherly mingle-mangle of collections out of other."—Burton. Transl. of Comen., 1648, p. 20.

• bŏtçh'-ĕr-ў, s. [Eng. botcher; -y.] The results of botching, clumsy workmanship.

"If we speak of base botchery, were it a comedy thing to see a great lord, or a king, wear sleeves of two patches, one half of worsted, the other of silk?"—World of Wonders, 1608, p. 250.

bŏtçh'-ĭng (1), pr. par., a., & s. [BOTCH (1), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & par. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive: The act of mending old clothes; the act of bungling.

"Nor is it botching, for I cannot mend it."
Browne Britannia's Pastorals, b. i. s.

bŏtçh'-ĭng (2), pr. par. [BOTCH (2), v.]

• bŏtçh'-ў, a. [Eng. botch (2); -y.] Marked with botches.

"And those boils did run? say so: did not the general run then? were not that a botchy core."—Shakesp.: Troil and Cress., ii. 1.

• bōte (1), • bot (Eng.), • bote, • bute (Scotch), s. [BOOT (1), s.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. (See boot.)

2. A remedy.

"And in hevn, A for his bale, and bugeth hym bote
And so amende that is myssaid ouer-more the better."
Piers Plow. (A.), iv. 99, 98.

3. Restoral on, amendment.

"And do be o to bruggen that to-broke were."
Piers Plow. (A.), vii. 98.

4. Safety.

"Bote of (or ?) helthe. Salus."—Prompt. Parv.

5. A saviour, the Saviour.

"But ther on com a bote as-tyt."
Early Eng. Allit. Poems (ed. Morris); Pearl, 648.

II. Law: An Anglo-Saxon term, still in use, meaning necessaries required for the carrying on of husbandry. The corresponding word of French origin is estovers or estouviers, from estoffer = to furnish. Such necessaries in certain cases may be taken from the estate of another. There are many kinds of bote. Thus house-bote is a sufficient allowance of wood to repair or to burn in the house. If to burn, it is a fire-bote. So plough-bote and cart-bote are wood to be employed in making and repairing all instruments of husbandry; and hay-bote or edge-bote is wood for repairing hay-edges or fences. [See also KIN-BOTE, MAN-BOTE, THEIF-BOTE.]

• bōte (2), s. [BOOT (2).]

"Bote for a mannys legge (bare or cokers, H. coker, P.) Bota, ocrea."—Prompt. Parv.

• bōte (3), s. [A.S. bodian = to command, to announce; bod = command.] A message.

"Charlis sent to thee this sond; thou ne getaist non othre b. s."—Sir Ferumb. (ed. Herrtage), 601.

bŏth-rĕn-chў ma, s. [From Gr. βόθρος (bothros) = a pit, and ἔγχυμα (enghuma) = an infusion, ἐγχυσις (enchusis) = to pour in; ἐν (en), and χεω (cheō) = to pour.]

Bot.: Pitted tissue, called also porous tissue or isomorm tissue, or dotted ducts, and by Morren Taphrenchyma. It consists of tubes which, when viewed under high microscopic power, seem full of holes, which, however, are only little pits in the thickness of the lining. It is of two kinds, articulated and continuous bothrenchyma. The former is well seen when its tubes are cut across in a cane or other woody-looking endogen; the latter consists of long, slender, interrupted pitted tubes, found often in connection with spiral vessels in the roots of plants. Wh t Lindley called granular woody tissue he ultimately reduced under the second of these types of b renchyma.

bŏth-ri-ō-cĕph-ă-lŭs, s. [From Gr. βοθρ-ιον (bothrion, dim.) = a small kind of ulcer, dimin. of βοθρος (bothros) = a hole, a pit, and κεφαλη (kephalē) = the head.]

Zool.: An intestinal worm belonging to the class Scolecida, and the order Tæniada or Cestoidea. Bothriocephalus latus is the Russian tapeworm.

bŏth-rō-dĕn-drŏn, s. [From Gr. βόθρος (bothros) = a pit, and δένδρον (dendron) = a tree.]

Palæont.: A tree with dotted stems found in the coal measures.

Bot.: An old English name for the plant genus Chrysanthemum.

* Chrysanthemum segetum is still called bubble in East Anglia.

"Bothel, bodelle, chrysanthemum. Bothul, bothel, oscorus."—Prompt. Parv.

bŏth-um, s. [Bottom.]

bŏth-y, bō th-le, *bāth-le, *bŏo-th-le, s. & a. [From Icel. buth; Gael. both = a hut, a booth, a tent; both = a flask, a hut; bot = a house.] (Booth.) (Scotch.)

A. As substantive:

1. Gen.: A booth, a cottage, a hovel.

2. Specially:

(1) A wooden hut.

"Fare thee well, my native cot, Bothy of the birken tree."
Jacobite Relics, ii. 109.

(2) A summer shieling. (Jamieson.)

(3) A hut of boughs or other material built for the purpose of hunting.

(4) A place where agricultural labourers are lodged upon a farm.

B. As adjective: Of which bothies are the essential feature.

¶ The bothy system: The system of lodging farm labourers in bothies. Whether this is the best method of housing them has been a matter of public discussion. The Rev. Dr. Begg, of Edinburgh, has been one of the greatest opponents of bothies.

bō-tie, s. [Botty.]

From Sw. buller = noise, Dan. bulder = noise, tumbling noise, bustle, brawl. So called from the noise which boulders make when rolled over a rocky or pebbly beach by a stormy sea or a river in flood.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang. (in the form bowlder*):* A word of Scandinavian origin, used, according to Jamieson, in Perthshire, where the term "boulder stane" was applied to "the large single stones found in the earth by those who make roads." Probably the term was also employed elsewhere than in Perthshire.

II. Geol. (of the form boulder*):* The adoption by geologists of the local word boulder has given it universal currency. It is used to signify a large, rounded block of stone, which, whether lying loose on the surface of the ground or imbedded in the soil, is of different composition from the rocks adjacent to which it now rests, and must, therefore, have been transported from a lesser or greater distance. From the last-mentioned facts, boulders are often called erratic blocks or, simply, erratics. [BOULDER-FORMATION, BOULDER-PERIOD.]

B. As adjective: Marked by the presence of boulders, acting as boulders do boulder clay, s. A clay stratified or unstratified, belonging to the boulder formation (q.v.).

boulder-formation, boulder formation, ˙

˙ A formation consisting of mud, sand, and clay, more frequently unstratified than the reverse, generally studded with fragments of rocks, some of them angular, others rounded, with boulders scattered here and there through the mass. When unstratified, it is called in Scotland till (q.v.). As much of the material has been transported from a greater or less distance, it is sometimes called drift. The old name diluvium, being founded on now abandoned hypotheses, has become obsolete. [DILUVIUM.] The formation exists only from the poles to about 40° of latitude, unless where the Alps or other high mountains in warmer ˙ have originated boulder formations of ˙ ˙ The nearer the poles one travels ˙ ˙ the more are the erratic boulders. The rocks on which they rest are furrowed and scored with lines, as if ice with stones projecting from its surface had heavily driven over them [GLACIATION.] Fossils, where they exist, indicate a very cold climate. 2. Fig.: Of limits not formed by any material thing:

"And hast thou crossed that unknown river, Life's dreary bound?"
Burns: Elegy on Captain M. Henderson.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between bounds and boundary:—"Bounds is employed to designate the whole space including the outer line that confines: boundary comprehends only this outer line. Bounds are made for a local purpose; boundary for a political purpose: the master of a school prescribes the bounds beyond which the scholar is not to go; the parishes throughout England have their boundaries, which are distinguished by marks; fields have likewise their boundaries, which are commonly marked out by a hedge or a ditch. Bounds are temporary and changeable; boundaries permanent and fixed: whoever has the authority of prescribing bounds for others, may in like manner contract or extend them at pleasure; the boundaries of places are seldom altered, but in consequence of great political changes. In the figurative sense bound or bounds is even more frequently used than boundary: we speak of setting bounds or keeping within bounds; but to know a boundary: it is necessary occasionally to set bounds to the inordinate appetites of the best disposed children, who cannot be expected to know the exact boundary for indulgence." (Crabb: Eng. Syn.)

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To limit; to terminate. Used of limits:—

(1) Produced by material obstacles preventing encroachment.

"Of that magnificent temple which doth bound
One side of our whole isle with grandeur round."
Wordsworth: Farewell.

(2) Produced by obstacles to extension or advancement not of a material character.

"Thus Heaven, though all sufficient, shows a thrift In his economy, and bounds his gift."
Dryden: Eleonora, 75-76.

"Vast was his empire, absolute his power,
Or bounded only by a law."
Cowper: Task, bk. vi.

2. To indicate the boundaries of.

II. Geom.: In the same sense as No. 1.

"That which bounds a solid is a superficies."—Euclid, bk. xi., def. 2.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between the verbs to bound, to limit, to confine, to circumscribe, to restrict:—"The first four of these terms are employed in the proper sense of parting off certain spaces. Bound applies to the natural or political divisions of the earth: countries are bounded by mountains and seas; kingdoms are often bounded by each other." "Limit applies to any artificial boundary: as landmarks in fields serve to show the limits of one man's ground from another; so may walls, palings, hedges, or any other visible sign, be converted into a limit, to distinguish one spot from another, and in this manner a field is said to be limited, because it has limits assigned to it. To confine is to bring the limits close together, to part off one space absolutely from another: in this manner we confine a garden by means of walls. To circumscribe is literally to surround: in this manner a circle may circumscribe a square: there is this difference however between confine and circumscribe, that the former may not only show the limits, but may also prevent egress and ingress, whereas the latter, which is only a line, is but a simple mark that limits. From the proper acceptation of these terms we may easily perceive the ground on which their improper acceptation rests: to bound is an action suited to the nature of things or to some given rule; in this manner our views are bounded by the objects which intercept our sight: we bound our desires according to principles of propriety. To limit, confine, and circumscribe, all convey the idea of control which is more or less exercised. . . . In as much as all these terms convey the idea of being acted upon involuntarily, they become allied to the term restrict, which simply expresses the exercise of control on the will: we use restriction when we limit and confine, but we may restrict without limiting or confining: to limit and confine are the acts of things upon persons, or persons upon persons; but restrict is only the act of persons upon persons. . . . Bounded is opposed to unbounded, limited to extended, confined to expanded, circumscribed to ample, restricted to unshackled." (Crabb: English Synon.) bound (3), v. i. & t. [From Fr. bondir = to leap; O. Fr. bondir, bundir = to resound, connected with Lat. bombito = to buzz, to hum; bombus = a humming, a buzzing.] [Bound, s., Bound (2), s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Of man or the lower animals: To leap, jump, to spring, to move forward by a succession of leaps.

"Whom my fond heart had mounted to itself Bounding from cliff to cliff amidst the wilds."
Hemans: The Siege of Valencia.

"Now, while the birds thus sing a joyous song,
And while the young lambs bound
As to the tabor's sound,
To me alone there came a thought of grief."
Wordsworth: Intimations of Immortality.

2. Of things:

(1) To rebound.

"And the mighty rocks came bounding down
The startled foes among."
Hemans: Song of the Battle of Morgarten.

(2) To throb, run.

"My mother's blood
Runs in the calmer cheek, and this sinister Bounds in my father's."
Shakesp.: Tr. & Cres., iv. 5.

In nature's boundless realm
Howard: The Vespers of Palermo

(2) Loosely: Of anything vast in extent, though really limited:

"The British fleets the boundless ocean awe."
Irvine: Epistle to Dr Charleton, 23.

2. Of things immaterial or abstract, not measurable by actual space:

(1) Of time.

Though we make duration boundless as it is, we cannot extend it beyond all being: God fills eternity. —Locke.

(2) Of power, the human desires, or anything:

"Boundless rapacity and corruption were laid to his charge." Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. xxiv.

The news was received in London with boundless exultation."—Ibid., ch. xviii.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between bounded, unbounded, unlimited, and infinite: "Endless, or without bounds, is applied to infinite objects which admit of no bounds to be made or conceived by us. Unbounded, or not bounded, is applied to that which might be bounded. Unlimited, or not limited, applies to that which might be limited. Infinite, or not finite, applies to that which in its nature admits of no bounds. The ocean is a boundless object so long as no bounds to it have been discovered: desires are often unbounded which ought always to be bounded: and power is sometimes unlimited which is always better limited; nothing is infinite but that Being from whom all finite beings proceed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) bŏ̂und less ly, adv. [Eng. boundless; -ly.] Limitlessly; so as not to be confined within any bounds:

2. Fig.: Of nature or anything personified.

"He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed, for he giveth of his bread to the poor."—Prov. xxii. 9.

¶ Sometimes the thing given is preceded by of and the recipient of the gift by to:

"Our king spares nothing to give them the taste of that felicity of which he is so bountiful to his kingdom." Dryden.

II. In a passive sense: Liberally supplied, given, or furnished; as in such an expression as "there was a bountiful supply of dainties."

bŏ̂unt-i-fŭl ly, adv. [Eng. bountiful; -ly.] In a bountiful manner, bounteously, liberally, abundantly, largely. Used—

1. Of alms given by man.

"And now thy alms is given in,
And thy poor starveling bountifully fed."
Deane.

2. Of large blessings bestowed by God.

"[illegible] for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee."—Psalm cxvi. 7.

3. Of similar blessings unconsciously bestowed by anything in nature:

"It is affirmed, that it never raineth in Egypt; the river Nilus falls, repairing it in its inundation."—Browne: Vulgar Errours.

A. As substt.: The Common Elder-tree (Sambucus nigra).

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or consisting of the shrubs described under A.

bountry berries, s. pl. The berries of the Elder-tree.

"Bountry-guns are formed of the elder tree, the soft pith being taken out, and are charged with wet paper."—Blackwood's Mag., Aug. 1821, p. 35.

bŏ̂unt-y, * bŏ̂unt-ee, * bŏ̂unt-ĕ, * bŏ̂wnt-ĕ, s. & a. [In Fr. bonté = goodness, kindness, benignity. From Norm. Fr. bountee, bounte = goodness (Kelham); O. Fr. bontet, Prov. bontat, Sp. bondad; Port. bondade; Ital. bontà, Lat. bonitas = goodness; bonus = good.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Goodness, excellence, kindness, beneficent feeling in the abstract or in general, the quality of being kind.

(1) Gen.: In the foregoing sense:

"In world nis non so [illegible]
That al hire bounte tellen kan."
Specc. Lyr. Poetry (about 1300), Algarsus, 29. (Specc. Early Eng., Morris & Skeat, pt. ii.)

* (2) Spec.: Valour. (Scotch.)

"That thus the king of England,
Frae worship and thrae strength o' land,
And thrae their lordes gret bountè, Descendit in his native centre."
Barbour: The Bruce (ed. Skeat), viii. 163.

2. Such beneficent feeling carried into action, specially in the direction of almsgiving; the act of giving money or other favours graciously or munificently; an act of kindness, generosity, liberality, munificence:

"For as I write[illegible], that was she That didde to me so gret bounte."
The Romaunt of the Rose.

3. That which is given liberally or munificently.

* (1) A good deed; a special deed of valour resulting from the "goodness" of the individual. (Scotch.)

"To do ane outrageous bounte."
Barbour: The Bruce (ed. Skeat), ii. 178.

(2) Alms, a donation of money, or anything similar, the result of generosity.

"To worth or want well weigh'd be Bounty given."
Pope: Mor. Ess., iii. 229.

(3) Success resulting from the Divine goodness, welfare:

"Of man so hard [sted] as was he
That efterwart[illegible] [illegible] bounte."
Barbour: The Bruce (ed. Skeat), i. 47-8.

II. Technically:

1. Ch. & Civ. Hist.: A grant or benefaction from the state to those whose services indirectly benefit it, and to whom, therefore, it desires to accord some recompense, or at least recognition.

¶ Queen Anne's Bounty: A bounty to the more poorly endowed livings in the English Church. It was conferred by a royal charter confirmed by Queen Anne (2 Anne, ch. 11), and provides that all the revenue of first-fruits and tenths shall be vested in trustees for ever, and used as a perpetual fund for augmenting the endowments of poorer livings, and for advancing money to incumbents for rebuilding parsonages thereon. The trustees administering it have been formed into a corporation, and when applied to for grants act on rules which they have framed for the administration of the trust.

2. Law, Comm., & Polit. Econ.: A premium paid by Government to the producers, exporters, or importers of certain articles, or to those who employ ships in certain trades. This is done either with the view of fostering a new trade during its infancy, or of protecting an old one which is supposed to be of special importance to the country.

The history of bounties affecting general commerce naturally divides itself into two periods. During the first of these, statesmen, and the educated classes generally, believed in the advantage of bounties, and they were paid on the exportation of corn, of linen, and other commodities, and in connection with the herring and whale fisheries. They were denounced by Adam Smith and other political economists. To tax the general public that goods may be benevolently furnished to the foreigner at unremunerative rates cannot possibly make a nation richer, and if a manufacture or a fishery cannot pay its way unaided, it should be abandoned, and the money which it has locked up be turned into more profitable channels. These views having been adopted by the English Parliament, the bounty on the exportation of corn was abolished in 1815, and that on the exportation of linen and several other articles in 1830. In the last-mentioned year the bounty on the exportation of herrings was swept away, that paid on the tonnage of the vessels employed in whale-fishing having ceased in 1824.

The second period in the history of bounties affecting British commerce is in certain respects the antithesis of the former one. The British manufacturer, standing manfully on his own resources, is in certain cases exposed to unduly severe competition, bounties to the foreign manufacturer enabling him to send his goods into the country at rates which he would otherwise find unremunerative. The system is now before the public in connection with the home and colonial sugar industries. The sugar duty in France and America is levied on the raw sugar, before it undergoes the process of refining. If the French or American manufacturer export refined sugar, the duty previously levied on the raw material is returned under the name of drawback, and as it is difficult to know how much raw sugar was used in making a certain weight of the refined article, he so takes the benefit of the doubt as to obtain a greater drawback on a given quantity than the duty he paid upon it in its raw state. The excess—in other words the profit, which he makes from the public treasury of his country, is the export "bounty." The same system obtains in Holland and Belgium, besides which the beetroot sugar manufacturers of these countries, together with those of Austria, Germany, and Russia, obtain a similar bounty on beetroot sugar. In Germany, Austria, and Russia the duty is levied on the weight of the root; in Belgium, on the density of the juice. In Austria and Russia the weight of the root is estimated according to the capacity of the apparatus. Under such systems a large portion of the sugar produced entirely escapes taxation, and as the full drawback is allowed on all sugar exported, the result is a large bounty on exportation.

In the United States, the McKinley Tariff Bill, which removed the duty from imported sugar, placed the American sugar producer, with whom the natural advantages for sugar cane culture were less favorable than in the West Indies, under a disadvantage. To obviate this, and also to encourage the development of the beetroot sugar industry, a bounty was granted to the sugar producer, sufficient to overcome the disadvantage named. The term bounty was also employed to designate the sums paid to induce enlistment during the Civil War, and to obtain substitutes for drafted men. These men frequently deserted, and were then known by the title of BOUNTY-JUMPER.

The same term is applied in the United States to grants of land to soldiers and sailors, their widows and children, for services in the army and navy. It is also applied to sums of money paid by government to owners of fishing vessels, by Act of Congress of July 29, 1813, for the encouragement of the fishing industry, and to sums of money appropriated for the destruction of wild beasts during the time that the country was sparsely settled. The amounts paid to companies which carry the mail by land or water have been called bounties, but a more proper term for them is that of appropriations for carrying the mails.

of a Lille merchant. She was born in 1616, was physically ugly to the last degree, but very eloquent. She published twenty-two volumes Poret, a French Protestant divine, wrote her life.]

Theol. & Ch. Hist.: A system of doctrine emanating from Mdme. Bourignon, mentioned in the etymology. She attributed to Christ a twofold human nature, one produced by Adam, the other born of the Virgin Mary, and believed that nature corrupt. She denied the decrees of God, believed in the existence of a good and of an evil spirit in every man before he was born, attributed to man an infinite will, and considered that perfection was attainable. She taught that religion consisted in internal emotions, not in knowledge or practice. The Scottish General Assembly censured these tenets in 1701.

Ecclesiol.: A very youthful functionary in the Medieval Church, chosen in some, if not in all, cathedrals on the 6th of December (St. Nicholas-day), and retaining office till Innocents day, the 28th of the same month. St. Nicholas was said to have been deeply pious, even from infancy. He was, therefore, held up as a model for imitation by boys. The boy-bishop elected on his day was chosen by the suffrages of children. Once appointed, he had to "hold up the state of a bishop answerably, with a crozier or pastoral-staff in his hand and a mitre upon his head." He was attended by a dean and prebendaries, also children. Puttenham describes him as "a bishop who goeth about blessing and preaching with such childish terms as maketh the people laugh at his foolish counterfeit speeches." He was called also a barne bishop. (Old Eng. barne is the same as the Scotch bairn, meaning a child.) [NICK.]

"... said this summer, to have shot with his own hands fifty brace of pheasants."—Addison.

(2) Sometimes employed of men, but then contemptuously.

6. The state of being held tightly together; tightness, tension.

"The most frequent cause of deafness is the laxness of the tympanum, when it has lost its brace or tension." —Holder.

7. The state of being defended as if by armour; warlike preparation.

"So may he with more facile question bear it,
For that it stands not in such warlike brace."
Shakesp.: Othello, i. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Carpentry:

(1) A diagonal stay or scantling, connecting the horizontal and vertical members of a truss or frame, to maintain them at a prescribed angular relation.

(2) Pl. (braces): The timbers of a roof which serve to "strut" or prop the "backs" or principal rafters into which the upper ends are framed.

2. Cabinet-making: A stay for a trunk-lid or similar duty.

3. Shipwrighting: One of the eye-bolts on which the hooks of the rudder are secured: the gudgeons or gougings.

4. Naut.: A rope passing from the end of the yard to another mast, and serving to trim the yards fore and aft.

5. Music:

(1) One of the cords of a drum by which the heads are stretched.

(2) A vertical line, usually a circumflex, coupling two or more staves together, and designed to indicate that the music thus connected is to be performed simultaneously by instruments, voices, or the two hands of one playing such an instrument as the pianoforte. (Grove.)

BRACE.

6. Boring tools: A revolving hand-holder, one end of which is a swiveled head or shield, which rests in the hand or against the chest of the operator; at the other end is a socket to hold the bit. Called also a stock, more particularly in metal-working. The various kinds of brace in this sense are the ratchet brace, which is a corner drill, the crank brace, the hand-brace, and the lever-brace. They may be held in the hand or made to act by machinery.

7. Vehicles:

(1) An iron strap passing from the head-block, behind and below the axle, and forward to another portion of the running gear.

(2) A pointed bar by which the bows of a carriage-top are kept asunder, to distend the carriage-top cover.

(3) A thick strap by which a carriage-body is suspended from C springs.

8. Printing:

(1) A printer's sign; a crooked line connecting several words or lines. In poetry a triplet is occasionally so marked. Johnson gives the following instance—

"Charge Venus to command her son,
Where'er else she lets him pass,
To shun my house, and field, and grove
Peace cannot dwell with hate or love." } Prior.

(2) The stays of a printing-press, which serve to keep it steady in its position.

9. Mining: The mouth of a shaft.

B. As adjective: Pertaining to a brace in any of the foregoing senses.

(2) Of defensive armour for the body: To fasten tightly on; to make to embrace the body.

"Since he braced rebel's armour on."
Scott: Lord of the Isles, iii. 5.

"But for helmets braced and serried spears."
Hemans: Siege of Valencia.

(3) Of offensive weapons or equipment for the body: To fasten on tightly.

"And some who spurs had first braced on."
Scott: Lord of the Isles, vi. 21.

(4) Of a drum: To make tense; to strain up.

"The tympanum is not capable of tension that way, in such a manner as a drum is braced."—Holder.

(5) Of the yards of a vessel. [II. 2., Naut.]

2. Figuratively:

* (1) Of a person or an animal: To embrace, to encompass.

"For bigge Bulles of Basan brace hem about."
Spenser: Shep. Cal., ix.

(2) Of a place personified. [Corresponding to I., 1. (2).] To cause to embrace, to make to surround, to place around.

"Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains.
They crowned him long ago
On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds,
With a diadem of snow.
Around his waist are forests braced."
Byron: Manfred, i. 1.

(3) Of the nerves, or of the mind, as depending on them. [Corresponding to I. 1 (3).] To render tense, to impart vigour to. Used—

(a) Of the nerves.

"Ne were the goodly exercises spard
That brace the nerves, or make the limbs alert."
Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. 9.

(b) Of the mind as dependent on the nerves.

"And every moral feeling of his soul Strengthen'd and braced, by breathing in content"
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. 1.

"... more salutary bands which might perhaps have braced his too delicately constituted mind to steadfastness and uprightness."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

(c) Yet more fig.: Of the "nerves" of a government or other collective body.

"In truth to brace anew the nerves of that powerful body would have been a hard task even for Somers."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

II. Technically:

1. Carpentry, Joinery, &c.: To fit the braces to beams; to hold them together [and support them].

2. Naut. (of the yards): To turn horizontally by means of braces.

"Then the yards were braced about, and we stood with the wind."
Longfellow: Courtship of M. Standish, p. 6.

¶ (1) To brace about: To turn round with the view of sailing on the other tack.

(2) To brace in: To haul on the weather braces, so as to bring the yard more square with the ship.

(3) To brace sharp: To cause the yards to have the smallest possible angle with the keel.

(4) To brace to: To check the motion of the lee braces, and round in the weather ones, to assist in tacking.

(5) To brace up: To haul in the lee braces, so as to bring the yard nearer the direction of the keel.

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. A piece of defensive armour for the arm. (Johnson.) A "bracer." [Bracer.]

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN BRACELETS.

2. An ornament for the wrist, generally worn by ladies. It is distinguished from the armlet, the latter, as its name implies, being worn on the arm and not on the wrist.

"With bracelets of thy hair." —Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 1.

"With amber bracelets beads and all this knacks."
—Lord of Misrule: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 3.

"Bugle bracelet, necklace amber." —Winter's Tale, iv. 4.

II. Technically:

1. Scripture:

(1) As worn by men:

(a) An armlet worn as the symbol of royal or reign power. The Heb. word so rendered (etsâdâh), from עָצַד (tsâdad) = to bind. [Armlet.]

"... and I took the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet [armlet] that was on his arm." —2 Sam. i. 10.

(b) As the rendering of the Hebrew word פְּתִיל (pethîl), from פָּתַל (pâthal) = to twist together. Gesenius and others believe it to mean a string by which a seal was suspended.

"And she said, Thy signet, and thy bracelets, and thy staff that is in thine hand." —Genesis xxxviii. 18.

"... the signet, and bracelets, and staff ..." —Jeremiah xxii. 24.

(2) As worn on the wrist as an ornament:

(a) The rendering of the Hebrew word צְמִיד (tsemîd), from צָמַד (tsâmad) = to bind together.

"I put the earring upon her nose, and bracelets upon her hands." —Gen. xxiv. 47.

"... bracelets rings ear-rings ..." —Numbers xxxi. 50.

"And I put bracelets upon thy hands ..." —Ezek. xvi. 11.

(b) The rendering of the Hebrew word שֶׁרְשֶׁרֶת (Sherâh) = a chain, from שָׁרַר (shârar) = to twist, to twist together.

"The chains, and the bracelets ... the ear-rings ..." —Isaiah iii. 19.

(c) The rendering of the Hebrew word חָשׁוּק (chûchâh), which Gesenius thinks means in the example a clasp, buckle, or pin for holding a lady's dress together.

... and he ... bracelets, and earrings, and rings, and ... all jewels of gold."—Book xxiv. 30

Anat. : ... junction of the first dorsal and the lower cervical nerves from which those of the arm issue.

2. Bot. : Measuring twenty four inches long, or what is conventionally assumed to be the length of the arm. (Loudley.) brách -i-ate, a. [From Lat. brachiatus ... with attractive branches, brachium, Gr. βραχιων (brachiōn) = the arm.]

Bot. : Presenting a certain resemblance to the extended arms of a man; that is, having horizontal branches standing forth nearly at right angles to a stem, and which, moreover, cross each other alternately; having opposite branches decussate. (Lindley, &c.)

brách in i dæ, s. pl. [From brachinus (q.v.).]

Entom. : A family of predatory beetles belonging to the section Truncatipennes. It contains the British genera Brachinus, Iarus, Lamprias, Lebia, Dromius, &c.

brách i nüs, s. [From Gr. βραχύνω (brachunō) = to shorten.]

Entom. : A genus of beetles, the typical one of the family Brachinidæ (q.v.). The species have their head and thorax comparatively narrow. Their chief peculiarity is a power which they possess of expelling from their hinder extremity a pungent acrid fluid with a loud report. Hence Latreille called them Bombardiers, or Bombardier Beetles. About five species occur in Britain, Brachinus crepitans being the most common. (Bombardier.)

brách i ó nid, s. [Brachiopoda.]

Zool. : Any Rotifer of the family Brachionidæ (q.v.).

brách i ón -i-dæ, s. pl. [From brachionus (q.v.).]

Zool. : A family of Rotifers, with a broad shield-shaped lorica, and short pointed.

brách i ón üs, s. [Gr. βραχιων (brachiōn), genit. βραχιονος (brachionos) = an arm.]

Zool. : The typical genus of the family Brachionidæ (q.v.), with several species. B. urceolaris has been found in London water.

brách i óp ó da, s. [From Gr. βραχίων (brachiōn) = the arm, and oblique cases of πους (pous), ποδος (podos) = a foot. Animals with arm like feet. The reference is to two long ciliated arms developed from the sides of the mouth, which are used to create currents in the water and bring food within reach of their mouth.]

Zool. & Palæont. : One of the great classes into which the molluscous sub-kingdom of the animal kingdom is divided. The Brachiopoda are bivalves, with one shell on the back of the animal, and the other in front. These are called dorsal and ventral valves. The two valves are never equal in size. They differ from the Conchifera (called also Lamellibranchiata), or ordinary bivalves, in uniformly having one side of the same valve symmetrical with the other. In technical language, the Brachiopoda are inequivalve and equilateral, while the True Bivalves are equivalve and inequilateral. The organisation of the Brachiopoda is inferior to that of the True Bivalves. They are attached to bodies by a pedicle which passes as the wick does in an antique lamp, whence the older naturalists called them "Lamp-shells." The shell is lined by an expansion of the integument or mantle. They are very important in a geological point of view, existing from the Cambrian rocks till now; but culminating apparently both in generic and specific development in the Silurian. In 1875 above 1,800 fossil species were known, more than 200 of them British. In 1879 Dr. Alleyne Nicholson made a much higher estimate, considering that nearly 4,000 extinct species had been described. The recent species are comparatively few. They are all marine, occurring chiefly in the deep sea. The families are: (1) Terebratulidæ, (2) Spiriferidæ, (3) Rhynconellidæ, (4) Orthidæ, (5) Productidæ, (6) Craniadæ, (7) Discinidæ, and (8) Lingulidæ (q.v.). (Woodward & E. Tate.)

A slightly different classification ranges the Brachiopoda in two sub-classes:—

(1) Inarticulata or Tetrabranchia: Fam. (1) Craniadæ, (2) Discinidæ, (3) Lingulidæ.

(2) Articulata: Fam. (1) Terebratulidæ, (2) Rhynconellidæ, (3) Thecidæ, (4) Spiriferidæ, (5) Pentameridæ, (6) Strophomenidæ, and (7) Productidæ.

brách i ó péde, brách i ó péd, s. [Brachiopoda.] A mollusc belonging to the class Brachiopoda (q.v.).

"The age of brachiopods: The Silurian period.

brách i óp -ó-dous, a. Eng. brachiopod(a); -ous.] [Brachiopoda.]

1. Having arms like feet.

2. Pertaining to the Brachiopoda.

brách i um, s. [Lat., an arm, particularly the forearm, from the hand to the elbow. In Gr. βραχιων (brachiōn).]

Bot. : An oil, china, twenty four inches, considered to be the average length of the arm in man.

Brach man (1) (ch silent), s. [Brahmin.]

Brach man (2) (ch silent), s. [Brahman.]

brách y cát a-lèc tic, a. [Lat. brachycatalecticus, from Gr. βραχυκατάληκτος (brachukatalēktos), an adj. = ending with a short syllable, short by a foot, βραχυς (brachus) = short, and καταλήγω (katalēgō) = leaving off, stopping.] (Catalectic.)

Greek & Latin Prosody: A verse wanting a foot; a verse wanting two syllables to complete it.

brách y céph ál ic, a. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and Eng. cephalic (q.v.).

Anthropol. : Having a short head; noting a skull in which the proportion of the breadth to the length is as 4 to 5.

"... these ... exhumed from the Drift and belonging to the brachycephalic type ... Darwin's Descent of Man, vol. i. (1871), pt. i., ch. iv., p. 150.

brách y céph ál y, s. [From Gr. βραχυκεφαλος (brachukephalos) = (1) short head, (2) a certain fish.]

Anthropol. : Shortness of head. It is opposed to dolichocephaly.

"Whether finds that short men incline more to brachycephaly and tall men to dolichocephaly ..." Darwin's Descent of Man, vol. i. (1871), pt. i., ch. iv., p. 146.

brách y çérh ör -a, s. pl. [Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and κερας (keras) = a horn. Short-horned animals.]

Entom. : A suborder of Diptera, consisting of two-winged flies with short "horns" or antennæ, having only three joints, the last one commonly with a long bristle. It contains seven families—Œstridæ, Muscidæ, Dolichopidæ, Syrphidæ, Therevidæ, Leptidæ, Stratiomyidæ, Bombylidæ, Anthracidæ, Acroceridæ, Empidæ, Hybotidæ, Asilidæ, Mydasidæ, and Tabanidæ. (See these terms; also Brachystoma, Notacantha, and Pantostoma.) The suborder Brachycera includes the greater part of the Diptera tribe.

brách y çç ör üs, s. [Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and κερας (keras) = a horn. Animals with short "horns" or antennæ.]

Entom. : A genus of Curculionidæ (Weevils) consisting of wingless, very rough insects, living on the ground. They occur in Africa and the South of Europe.

brách y -chi tón, s. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and χιτων (chitōn) = an undergarment.]

Bot. : A genus of plants belonging to the order Sterculiads (Sterculiads). It consists of trees found in the more tropical parts of Australia. Brachychiton acerifolium, is called ... tree, its red flowers having an aspect ... when viewed from a little distance. The ... natives make fishing nets from its bark. B. ... Lindl. is used for a similar ... besides which its seeds are eaten. (... of Bot.) brac-i ý-cō mē, s. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and κομη (komē) = the hair.]

Bot. : A genus of composite plants. Trifid, Subuliflorae. Brachycome iberidifolia is the Swan River Daisy.

brách -ý-di -ăg -ŏn -al, s. [Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and Eng. diagonal (q.v.).]

Geom. : The shortest of the diagonals in a rhombic prism. (Used also as an adj.)

"... the shorter lateral or brachydiagonal ... the longer lateral or macrodiagonal (of a rectangular prism with replaced sides and angles)."—Dana: Mineralogy (5th ed.), Introd., p. xxv.

brăch-ȳ-glŏt-tĭs, s. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and γλωττις (glōttis) = the glottis, the mouth of the windpipe.]

Bot.: A genus of composite plants allied to Senecio. The leaves of Brachyglottis Forsteri, called by the natives of New Zealand Puke-Puka, are used by them for paper.

• brăch-ȳg-raph'ĭc, a. [In Ger. brachygraphisch; from Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and γραφω (graphō) = to write.] A shorthand writer.

"At last he asked the brachygrapher, whether he wrote the notes of that sermon, or something of his own extempore."—Hughes: Notes on S. Gustavus, i. 9

• brăch-ȳg-raph'ȳ, s. [In Ger. brachygraphie; from Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and γραφη (graphē) = delineation, writing.] Shorthand writing, stenography.

"All the certainty of those high pretenders, being what they have of the first principles, and the word of God may be circumscribed up as small a circle as the creed when brachygraphy had crammed it within the compass of a penny."—Bloomfield

brăch-ȳ-ŏl'-ŏ-jȳ, s. [In Gr. βραχυλογια (brachulogia) = brevity in speech, βραχυλογεω (brachulogeō) = to be short in speech, βραχυς (brachus) = short, and λογος (logos) = a word, speech.]

Rhet.: Brevity of speech, expression of one's meaning in few words; laconic speech, like that of the ancient Spartans.

"Brachylogy of comparison: A figure of speech used principally by the Greek poets, but also found more or less in all languages, in which the object of comparison is not compared with the proper corresponding object, but is directly referred to the thing or person of which that object would be, if expressed, the attribute. Thus in the lines—

"They for their young Adonis may mistake
The soft luxuriance of thy golden hair"

the hair is compared directly with Adonis.

brăch-ȳ-ŏ'dŏnt, a. [Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and ὀδους (odous), genit. ὀδοντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Biol.: Having molar teeth with low crowns (as the deer); noting molars with low crowns. [HYPSODONT.]

brăch-ȳ-ŏ-pi-nə, s. [From brachypus (q.v.).]

Paleont.: A tribe or a family of the Amphibian order Labyrinthodontia. It has a parabolic skull, and the orbits oval, they being central or anterior. The genera are Brachyops, Micropholis, Rhinosaurus, and Bothriceps. [BRACHYOPS.]

brăch-ȳ-ŏps, s. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and ωψ (ops) or ωπ (ōps) = the eye, face, countenance.]

brăch ȳ pin ə kŏid, s. [Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and Eng. pinacoid.]

Crystall.: In the orthorhombic system, the plane parallel to the vertical and brachydiagonal axes.

• brăch ȳ pŏd ĭ-nə, s. pl. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short; and πους, genit. ποδος (pous, podos) = a foot.

Ornith.: The name given by Swainson to a subfamily of his Meruline (Thrushes).

brăch-ȳ-po-dĭ'-ŭm, s. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and πους (pous), genit. ποδος (podos) = a foot, in allusion to the short stalks of the spikelets.]

Bot.: A genus of Graminaceæ (Grasses), of which the English book-name is False Brome Grass. There are two British species, the Brachypodium sylvaticum or Slender, and the B. pinnatum, or Heath Brome Grass.

brăch ȳp ŏd oūs, a. [BRACHYPODIUM.]

Bot.: Having a short "foot" or stalk.

brăch-ȳ-prĭsm, s. [Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and Eng. prism.]

Crystall.: The prism of an orthorhombic crystal that lies between the unit prism and the brachydiagonal.

brăch-ȳp-tĕr-ə, s. [From Gr. βραχυπτερος (brachupteros) = short-winged; βραχυς (brachus) = short, and πτερον (pteron) = a wing.]

Ornith.: Cuvier's name for the diving birds now ranked under Colymbidæ, Alcadæ, and their allies.

brăch-ȳp-tĕr-ŏŭs, a. [From Gr. βραχυπτερος (brachupteros) = short-winged.] [BRACHYPTERA.] Short winged. (Brande.) brăch-ȳp-tĕr'-ȳx, s. [From Gr. βραχυς (brachus) = short, and πτερυξ (pterux) = a wing, from πτερον (pteron) = a wing.]

Ornith.: Horsfield's name for a genus of Ant thrushes (Formicariinæ), in which the wings are so short as to render flight short and feeble. Brachypteryx montana, the typical species, is found in Java. It is the Mountaineer Warbler of Latham.

brăch ȳ-pŭs, s. [BRACHYPODIUM.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the family Brachypsilinæ (q.v.).

Brah'-ma, ˢ Bra-ma, † Brah-man, s. [Deer, &c., Brahma, Brahmat; in Mahratta and the modern language of India, Brāhmá, from Sanscrit Brahman. † Brahman = a member of the Hindoo sacred caste; but (1) Neut. = force, power, will, wish, the propulsive force of creation, (2) Masc.: (a) Self; (b) The being Brahma (see def.). (Max Muller: Chips from a German Workshop, vol. i. (1867). pp. 70-1.).]

Hindu Mythol.: The first person of the Hindu triad, the others being Vishnu and Siva. Speaking broadly, the first is the Creator, the second the Preserver, and the third the Destroyer. The first is scarcely worshipped, except at Pokher, in Ajmere, and Benares, in the Deab, the residence of the autonomous Nana Saheb. He is represented as a man of a red colour, with four faces. He has four hands, in one of which he holds a portion of the Vedas, in one a lustral vessel, in one a rosary, and in one a sacrificial spoon. For the present state of his worship see BRAHMANISM.

Mahratta Brāhman; Sanscrit Brāhmana or Brāhman = Brahma (q.v.) + a member of the sacred caste, from Brahmana = Brahma (q.v.).]

A. As substantive:

1. Original: One of the Aryan conquerors of India who discharged priestly functions, whose supremacy, however, over his fellows was mainly moral and spiritual, but not yet political or supported by the caste system.

2. A: one of the four leading castes of India, the others theoretically at least, being Kshatriyas (Warriors), Vaisyas (Merchants), and Sudras (Labourers), not reckoning out-castes beyond the pale. [CASTE.] [For the rise of the Brahmans see BRAHMANISM.] The Brahmans in many places at present are about one-fourth part of the community. They are the hereditary priestly caste, having great social influence. They are admirably adapted for metaphysical speculation and for mathematical science; but throughout their vast literature they have almost uniformly told fictitious myths in lieu of history. Nor do they excel much in natural science. In these two points they fall short of the average Europeans. [BRAHMANISM.]

"... accept the Brahmens."—Mill: Hist. of India.

"... the Brahmans of Agra no longer form a distinct caste, ... from Kashmir to Cape Comorin, who preserve the ... they may be met with."—H. H. Wilson: Religions of the Hindus.

B. As adjective: In any way pertaining to a member of the caste described under A.

¶ Brahmin's beads: A name given in India to the corrugated seeds of Elæocarpus, used by the Brahmans and others as necklaces. They are sometimes worn as beads by children in East London, having been brought from India by seafaring friends.

Brahman bull, Brahminy bull, s. The Zebu, a variety of the Bos taurus, or Common Ox. It is distinguished by having a large fatty lump on its shoulders. Divine honours are paid to it in India, and it is deemed sacrilege to destroy one. It roams in the streets without any provision for its maintenance. It therefore helps itself from greengrocers' stalls or from gardens. It is not, as a rule, dangerous to pedestrians, but at times has warlike encounters with its humped competers, besides systematically persecuting all cattle destitute of a hump. It is unpopular with those who are not of the Hindoo faith, but they dare not for their lives openly injure it, though the writer has heard of one being killed, suspicion falling on a European whose garden the divine beast had robbed.

Brah'-man-ism, Brah-min-ism, s. [From Eng., &c. Brahman, Brahmin, and suff. -ism. In Ger. Brahmanism; Fr. Brahmanisme.]

Theol., Hist., & Phil.: The system of religious belief and practice introduced and propagated by the Brahmans. This greatly varied with the lapse of ages, but to every successive form of it the name Brahmanism may be applied.

The earliest inhabitants of India seem to have been mainly Turanians. [TURANIAN.] When, at a very remote period of antiquity, these entered the peninsula, an Aryan nation or tribe existed in Central Asia, N. W. of India, speaking a language as yet unrecognised, which was the parent of nearly all the present European tongues, our own not excepted. At an unknown date a great part of this Aryan nation migrated to the north west, and settled in Europe, the remainder taking the contrary direction, and entering India by the way of the Punjaub. [ARYAN.] Admiring the glorious Eastern sky, they applied to it, and to the elements of nature, glowing adjectival epithets: these gradually became abstract substantives, then the qualities expressed were personified, and gods ruling over the several elements were recognised. Thus the sky was first called Dyeu, adj. = (1) bright, then (2) brightness, next (3) the Bright God; or, if the adjectival meaning be retained, Divine. This is the familiar Lat. Deus = God. Similarly Dyaus = the sky, in Gr. Ζευς (Zeus), genit. Διος (Dios), from Διϝος (Dios), Latin Jovis-pater = Jupiter. Other divinities worshipped were, Agni = fire (Lat. ignis), Surya = the sun, Ushas = the dawn (Gr. ἠως (ēōs), Marut = storm (Lat. Mars), Prithivi = the earth, Ap = the waters, Nabh = the rivers, Varuna = the sky (Gr. οὐρανος (ouranos)), Mitra = the sun, and Indra = the day. These gods are invoked in the 1,017 hymns of the Rig-Veda, the oldest Aryan book in the world. Dr. Haug, of the Sanscrit College at Poonah, thinks the oldest of these may have been composed and uttered from 2400-2000 B.C., or at least from 2000 to 1400 B.C. Max Müller, the translator of the Rig-Veda, more moderately dates most of them between 1500 and 1200 B.C., believing the collection to have been finished about 1100 B.C. [RIG-VEDA, VEDA.]

Whilst the Aryans were in the Punjaub religious schism took place amongst them, and a large number of them left India for Persia with feelings so bitter that what their former friends left behind called gods they transformed into demons. The venerated Deva = God, was changed into daeva = an evil spirit. Iran (Persia) was the place to which the seceders went, and there their faith developed into Zoroastrianism (q.v.). (See also Zend-Avesta.)

The Rig-Veda was followed by three more, the Yajur-veda, the Sáma-veda, and the Atharva-veda, each with a Sanhita or collection written in poetry, and Brahmanas and Sutras, prose compositions; but these are not so valuable as the Rig Veda for tracing the old beliefs.

From about 1000 to 800 B.C. collections were being made of the old sacred literature. From about 800 to 600 B.C. the Brahmanas were composed (Dr. Haug thinks between 1400 and 1200 B.C.). Then the Sutras (exegetical compositions), which follow, make Brahmanas as well as Mantras divine.

The exact date of the two great epic poems—the Ramayana and the Mahabharat—is unknown; but the former is believed to be the older. By the time that it appeared the constellation of Vedic gods had set, and one of deified heroes was arising or had arisen. Rama, the deified King of Ayodhya (Oude), the hero of the former poem, is still extensively worshipped, along with his friend and follower, Hunooman, the monkey god. So is Krishna, the hero of the Mahabharat.

During the period of the Brahmanas, the Brahmanic priesthood had risen to great power; during that of the Sutras they were in quiet enjoyment of their caste dignity. By the sixth century Boodha had arisen to preach the equality of all castes, and his system was dominant in India from about 250 B.C. till 750 A.D., that is, for a thousand years. [BOODHISM.]

When Brahmanism reasserts its sway the Hindoo triad of gods—Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva—have arisen (see these words). Nay, Brahma has become almost obsolete, and the respective advocates of Vishnu and Shiva are at variance. Between the twelfth and the sixteenth centuries monastic reforms formed sects, some Vishnuvite, others Sivaite. New sacred books, called, however, Puranas (meaning old), are penned to advocate the tenets of conflicting sects, and, though contradicting each other, are accepted as divine. The Mohammedan invasion somewhat repressed their quarrels. [PURANAS.] At present, the worship of Vishnu under the forms of Krishna and of Rama, and of Siva under that of the Lingam; with the veneration of Sukti, the power and energy of the divine nature in action; to which must be added the adoration of Hunooman, Rama's friend, and in many places of aboriginal Turanian gods, are the most prevalent forms of popular Hindooism. Reformers are tilting back on the Vedas, and Christianity obtains converts from it in every part of the land.

Brah-man ist, s. [From Eng., &c. Brahman; and suff. -ist.] A professor of the Brahmanic faith. [BRAHMANISM.]

Bickersteth, in his 'Physical Atlas' gives the following distribution of the human race according to religion:—Brahmanists ... 14·4 per cent.—Max Muller: Chips from a German Workshop, vol. i. p. 26. (Note.)

"... to beat this from his brain ...
Shakesp.: ...

¶ To cudgel the brains: To stimulate the faculty of attention, with the view of solving an intellectual difficulty which ... satisfactorily disposed of in one's ordinary listless mental state.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: That part of the nervous system contained within the cranium, or cheapest the central part of the nervous system ... posed of the cerebrum, cerebellum, ... dulla oblongata (q.v.). It is formed ... continuity of the fibres of the spinal ... upwards to the cephalic centres.

¶ (1) Compar. Anat.: The centre ... nervous system in the lowest of the animals which possess a brain is in the form ... double cord; a step higher ... ganglia are developed on one ... cord. Such is the rudimentary structure ... brain in the lowest vertebrata. In the lowest fishes the anterior extremity of the ... cord shows a succession of five pairs ... ganglia; in the higher fishes and ... the first two become fused into a single ganglion; then follow only three ... symmetrical ganglia. This carries us up in the animal scale to mammalia (q.v.), for instance in the dog and cat we find a single ganglion, cerebellum, then three pairs following each other, and the primitive ganglia of opposite sides, at first separate, become united by means of transverse fibres, commissures (com-missure = a joining), for associating in function the two symmetrical portions. Hence the deduction that the brain in the lower animals consists of primitive cords, primitive ganglia upon these cords, and commissures which connect the substance of adjoining ganglia and associate their functions.

(2) Human Anatomy:

(a) In the fœtus: In the human fœtus, the earliest sign of the spinal cord is a pair of minute longitudinal filaments side by side; on the anterior extremity of these five pairs of minute swellings are seen, not in a straight line, as in fishes, but curved on each other to correspond with the future cranium. The posterior pair soon become cemented on the middle line, forming one; the second pair also unite; the third and fourth, at first distinct, are soon veiled by a lateral development arching backwards to conceal them; and the anterior pair, at first small, become less and almost lost in the development of the other pairs; so that the architecture of the human brain is the same as that of the lower animals, but progressive. [ARCHENCEPHALA.]

(b) In the adult: In the adult the primitive cords, described under 2 (a), have become the spinal cord, at the upper extremity they enlarge under the name of crura cerebri; the first pair of ganglia, developed from the primitive cords, have become the cerebellum; the second pair (the optic lobes of animals) become the corpora quadrigemina of man; the third pair, the optic thalami, and the fifth, the corpora striata, are the basis of the hemispheres, which, the merest lumina in fishes, have become the largest portion, the cerebrum, of the brain in man; the fifth pair (olfactory lobes), so large in the lowest forms, wane into the olfactory bulbs of man. The brain is composed of fibres or fasciculi ranged in some parts longitudinally, in others interlaced at various angles by cross fibres, and the whole held together by a delicate areolar web, which is the bond of support of the entire brain. It is enveloped by three membranes, the dura mater, the arachnoid, and the pia mater (q.v.). The brain substance is of two kinds, differing in density and color, a grey or cinerituous or cortical substance, and a white or medullary substance. The grey substance forms a thin sheet over the entire surface of the convolutions of the cerebrum, and of the lamina of the cerebellum, hence it has been named cortical; it is likewise found in the centre of the spinal cord through its entire length, and through the medulla oblongata, crura cerebri, thalami optici, and corpora striata, in the locus perforatus, tuber cinereum, casuara mollis, pineal gland, pituitary gland, and corpora rhomboidea. As clearly shown by Dr Stevcking, there is a peculiar property in the white matter of the brain, viz. the great elasticity of the medullary substance, not the resiliency afforded by this or that disposition of the rigid structures existing in brain, and which do not, as anciently supposed, remove it entirely from the influence of atmospheric pressure. Its anatomoscopic elements of the brain are the nerve-fibres from $\frac{1}{4000}$ to $\frac{1}{1500}$ of an inch in diameter, grey nerve-fibres, one-half or one-third less than the white in diameter, varicose nerve-cells, between $\frac{1}{500}$ and $\frac{1}{1500}$ of an inch in diameter; and nerve-granules, between $\frac{1}{4000}$ and $\frac{1}{12500}$ of an inch in diameter, with a variable number of pigment-granules. The division of nerves into cranial and spinal is decidedly arbitrary, for with respect to origin, that of the first (the olfactory) proceed from the spinal cord or its immediate prolongation, the crura...

The weight of the human brain, according to Sœmmering, is 2 lbs. 5½ oz. to 3 lbs. 1 oz. Dr. Aitken says from 30 to 52 ounces, with a bulk of from 65 to 84 cubic inches. Dr John Reid states that there is an average difference of 5 oz. 11 drs. in favor of the male brain. According to Sœmmering, the largest brain of a horse is 1 lb. 7 oz.; that of a full-grown elephant dissected by Sir Astley Cooper had a weight of 8 lbs. 1 oz.; and Rudolphi found that the common whale (Balæna mysticetus) 30 feet long, to weigh 5 lbs. 10½ oz.

The average sp. gr. of healthy brain is 1·036; that of grey matter, 1·034, of white, 1·041. Its blood supply is derived through the pia mater membrane.

2. Of... The chemical constituents of the brain ... albumen; fatty matter, including two acid compounds containing a large amount of phosphorus, from eight to ten parts in 1,000, or one-twentieth to one-thirtieth of the whole solid matter; also salts, and from four-fifths to seven-eighths of water.

3. Physiol: The organ for manifestation of the intellectual faculties, such as the emotions, the passions, and volition, and also of sensation. The evolution of nerve-force connected with mind emanates directly from the hemispherical ganglia. The spinal cord, by its connection with the brain, is the essence of combined movements. The brain alone furnishes conditions necessary for intelligence; the spinal cord for movement; and together they connect the balancing and co-ordination of motor and sensitive power.

4. Path: The chief diseases of the brain are—abscess of the organ, aphasia (in which the anterior lobes are affected, with difficulty of expressing thought), apoplexy (q.v.), brain fever, cancer, concussion and compression, epilepsy, hydrocephalus, hysteria, headache, induration, insanity, paralysis, softening, sunstroke and tumors (q.v.).

B. As adjective: Relating to the brain in any of the foregoing senses. (See the compounds which follow.)

¶ Obvious compound: Brain-development (Darwin: Descent of Man, pt. i., vol. i.)

brain-born, a. Generated by one's own brain or mind.

"Each hath his pang, but feeble sufferance from With brain-born dreams of evil wan."
Byron: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, iv. 7.

brain-bred, a. Engendered in or sprung from the brain.

"Love's brain-bred strife."—J. Taylor: Works (1630), p. 111.

brain-case, s. The part of the skull which encases the brain.

* brain child, s. An idea.

"A brain-child of my own." B. Jonson: New Inn, i. 1.

brain fever, s. A term in common use for inflammation of the lining membranes of the brain, meningitis, or of the brain itself, cerebritis. These are generally found in conjunction, seldom separate, and are termed phrenitis, or encephalitis. Often associated (a) with tubercalosis, or scrofula; sometimes (b) with gout, rheumatism, or syphilis; in the first instance generally in the case of children and delicate young females, in the others chiefly in adult males; very frequently, also, from injury, or as a consequence of previous diseases. Brain-fever is characterized by violent headache, intolerance of light, excitement, extreme sensitiveness, hyperæmia, delirium, convulsions, and coma. These are the symptoms of cerebral irritation, which is often followed by cerebral depression. So real is the delirium that it cannot be distinguished from true perceptions.

brain pan, s. The same as BRAIN-CASE (q.v.). [BRAINPAN.]

* brain wood, s. [BRAINSWOOD.]

brain worm, s. (Fig.) A worm infesting the brain. (Used in controversy contemptuously of an adversary.) (Milton: Colasterion.) brain-wright, s. One who thinks or devises for another. (Halliwell: Cont. to Lex.)

brāin, v.t. [From brain, s. (q.v.).]

1. Lit.: To dash out the brains.

"There thou may st brain him."
Shakesp: Tempest, iii. 2.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To defeat. (Used of a purpose, &c.)

"That brained my purpose."
Shakesp: Measure for Measure, v. 1.

(2) To conceive in the brain, to understand.

"Tongue and brain not." Shakesp: Cymbeline, v. 4.

brāindge, v.i. [Etym. doubtful.] To rush rashly forward.

"Thou never braindg't, an fetch't, an fiskit,
But thy auld tail thou wad hae whiskit."
Burns: Auld Farmer to his Auld Mare Maggie.

* brāin'-ish, a. [Eng. brain; -ish.] Brainsick.

"In this brainish apprehension, kills
The unseen good old man." Shakesp. Hamlet, iv. 1.

brāin'-lēss, * brāin-lēsse, * brāin-lēs, a. [Eng. brain, and suff. -less.] Without intellect, dull, stupid. (Fig.)

"If the dull brainless Ajax come safe off."
Shakesp.: Troil., i. 3.

* brāin'-pān, * brāin'-pānne, s. [Eng. brain; pan.] The pan-like cavity containing the brain; skull.

"My brain pan had been cleft."—Shakesp. 2 Hen. VI. iv. 1.

brāin sick, a. [A.S. brægen-seóc.]

1. Of persons: Of diseased brain or mind; not quite in one's mind, with the intellect touched; flighty, one-sided, injudicious.

"What! more fools still! Be ruled by me and go back: who knows whether such a brain-sick fellow will lead you?"—Bunyan: P. P., pt. i.

2. Of things: Produced by a diseased brain or mind.

"Because Cassandra's mad: her brain-sick raptures Cannot distaste the goodness of a quarrel."
Shakesp: Troil., ii. 2.

* brāin-sick-ly, adv. [Eng. brainsick; -ly.] In a brainsick manner, in such a way as one of diseased brain or mind might be expected to do; with lack of sound judgment.

"You do unbend your noble strength, to think So brainsickly of things."
Shakesp: Macbeth, iii. 2.

brāin sick-nēss, * brāin sick-nēsse, s. [Eng. brain; sickness.] Sickness, or any affection of the brain, accompanied by more or less of mental disease.

"... brainsickness they entitle promptitude, quickness, and celerity."—Holland: Plutarch, p. 77. Richardson.

brāin-stōne, s. [Eng. brain; stone.]

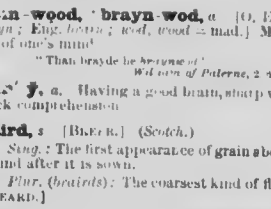
Zool.: A name for the genus of corals called



BRAINSTONE.

by naturalists Meandrina, in which the surface resembles the convolutions or meanderings of the human brain.

* brāin-wood, * brayn-wod, a. [O. Eng. brayn; Eng. brain; wod, wood = mad.] Mad, out of one's mind.

"Than brayde he brayne-wod."
Wil cum of Paterne, 2 pt.

brāin'-y, a. Having a good brain, sharp wit, quick comprehension.

† brāird, s. [BREARD.] (Scotch.)

1. Sing.: The first appearance of grain above ground after it is sown.

2. Plur. (brairds): The coarsest kind of flax. [BREARD.]

* brāis, v.t. [From Fr. bras = the arm.] [EMBRACE.] To embrace.

"And leif ane uthir thy laggis to brais."
Dunbar: Brumalyne Poems, p. 56, st. 3.

brāize, s. [BRAIZE.]

brāize, v.t. [Fr. braiser, for braise = hot charcoal.] To cook in a braising-pan.

brāiz ing, s. & a. [BRAISE, v.]

Cookery: A term given to a process of cooking meat, which combines the advantages of baking and stewing. Properly speaking, it is performed in a braising-pan, which is a stew-pan with a closely-fitting lid constructed to hold live embers, so that the meat can be cooked from above and below simultaneously, though it is often done in an ordinary sauce-pan kept tightly closed.

braising-pan, s. A pan for cooking meat as described in BRAISING (q.v.).

brāit, s. [Etymology doubtful. Dr. Murray considers that the word is a mistake for bort (q.v.).]

Jewelry: A rough diamond.

* brāith, a. [O. Icel. brathr = swift, headlong, furious; O. Sw. brather; Sw. bråd; Dan. brad.] Violent, severe.

"Throuch the braith blaw, all byrstyt owt of blud; Butless to ground he smat him quhar he stud."
Wallace, xi. 171. MS. (Jamieson.)

• braith-full, • breith-ful, a. [Eng. braith (q. v.); suffix -full(l).] Sharp, violent.

"In sum the greyt and ire dyd that habound, Rasyt wyth braithfull stangis full unmesurd."
Doug. Virgil, 379, 38.

• braith-ly, • braith-lie, a. & adv. [O. Icel. brathligr.]

A. As adjective: Violent, impetuous, fierce, wrathful.

"This goddes went, quhare Eolus the king
In goustly cauis, the windis loud quhistling
And braithlie tempestis, by his power restrayns."
Doug. Virgil, 14, 46.

B. As adverb: Violently, with great force.

"Wnnes a word he mycht bryng out for ecue
The baithfull ters bryat breithly fra hyr eyne."
Wallace, vi. 209. MS. Also iii. 375. (Jamieson.)

brāise (Eng.), brāise, brāse (Scotch), s. [A.S. bers, bears = a perch, a wolfish or voracious fish (Sommer); Sw. braxen = a bream; Dan. & Dut. brassen = a bream; Ger. brassen = a bream.]

1. English (of the form braize): Braize, the name of the Pagrus genus of fishes, and specially of the species Pagrus vulgaris or Common Braize, called also the Becker, the Pandora, and the King of the Sea-bream. It belongs to the family Sparidæ. It is found, though rarely, in the British seas.

2. Scotch (of the forms braise and braze): The roach (Leuciscus rutilus), one of the Cyprinidæ.

"Salmon, pike, and eels of different kinds, frequent the Earnock and Blane, but no fish in greater abundance, at a certain season of the year, than the braize (roach, Ang.). Vast shoals come up from Lochlomond, and by nets are caught in those sands."—P. Kilpatrick, Stirlings. Statist. Acc. of Scotland, xvi. 109.

• brāk, pret. of v. [A.S. bræc, pret. of brecan.] [Break, v.] Broke.

"I trow at Troye whan Pirrus brak the wal."
Chaucer: C. T., Man of Lawes Tale, 288.

• brāk, s. [From Dut. braak = a breaking; O. Icel. brak = breaking, uproar.] An outbreak, uproar, riot.

• brāke, pret. of v. [Break, v.]

"... he brake his mind to his wife and children."—Bunyan: P. P., pt. i.

brāke (1), brēak (Eng.), brāik, breāk (Sc. Ir.), s. & a. [In (N. H.) Ger. hache: L. Ger. brake = an instrument for breaking flax; Dut. braak = breaking, burglary, brake. From Dut. breken; Ger. brechen = to break.] [Break, v.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Agriculture: An instrument or machine to break flax or hemp. (Johnson.) It is toothed.

"When it is dry enough, break it with your brakes, and afterwards rub and scutch it."—Maxwell: Sel. Trans., p. 82.

2. A cross-bow.

"And ... schulde schete to the frenche prut with ... bowes and bowes of brake."—Sir Ferumbras, 3,58.

"Not rams, nor mighty brakes, nor slings alone."
Fairf. Tasso, xviii. 43. Also st. 44.

3. An instrument of torture.

"Had I that honest blood in my veins spum, queen, that your feats and these sights have drained from me, honour should call hard ere it drew me into these brakes."—Heath: Epoch. Thierry & Theod., v. 1.

4. The handle of a ship's pump. (Johnson.)

5. A baker's kneading-trough. (Johnson.)

6. A sharp bit or snaffle, a horse-bit. (Cole, Johnson, &c.)

7. A machine in which horses unwilling to be shoed are confined during the operation.

(1) Lit. Of horses: In the foregoing sense.

(2) Fig. Of persons: A restraint, a curb of any kind upon liberty, the appetites, the passions, &c. (or this may be the figurative sense corresponding to 1., 6).

"Who rules his rage with reason a brake." Turberville.

"Drest, you still for man should take him,
And not think he had eat a stake,
Or were set up in a brake."
B. Jonson.

8. A large and heavy kind of harrow, chiefly used for breaking in rough ground. (Scotch.)

"A pair of harrows, or brake for two horses, on the best construction, 1775, £2 2s.; 1909, £4."—Wilson: Kenfr., p. 87.

II. Technically:

1. Machinery:

(1) The kneading-machine used by bakers. It consists, in some cases, of a pivoted lever operating on a bench.

(2) Any other machinery for effecting the same purpose.

(3) A friction-strap or bend applied on the periphery of the drum of a hoisting-machine, crane, or crab.

2. Hydraulics: The extended handle of a fire-engine or similar pump, by which the power is applied. (Used especially of an extended handle at which a row of men can work together.)

3. Vehicles:

(1) A vehicle for breaking horses, consisting of the running-gears, and a driver's seat, without any carriage-body.

(2) A rubber pressed against the wheel of a vehicle, to impede its revolution, and so arrest the descent of the vehicle when going down hill.

(3) The part of a carriage by which it is enabled to be turned. The fore-carriage.

(4) A high-built, open vehicle, having three or more seats, designed for jaunting.

4. Railroad engineering: A contrivance for stopping the motion of a car-wheel by friction applied thereto. Railway brakes are of various kinds. There are hand-brakes, air-brakes, &c.

A hand-brake is put in action by a winding drum connecting chains and levers, the power of the brakesman being applied to a hand wheel in the carriage. The air or atmospheric brake operates by means of compressed air. It can bring a train running forty-five miles an hour to a standstill within 250 feet.

"A number of gentlemen, representing various railway companies, attended at Ipswich on Wednesday, to witness a trial of a brake, the invention of Mr. Sullivan, M.P. The arrangement is especially adapted for application to railway carriages which are already fitted with the ordinary hand brake. Stoppages were made in short space, and with much steadiness."—Weekly Sentinel, May 17, 1879.

5. Basket-making: An iron or tech with a sharp-edged re-entering angle, adapted to peel the bark from osiers drawn therethrough.

B. As adjective: Adapted to, pertaining to, or in any way connected with a brake.

brake-beam, s.

Vehicles: The transverse beam connecting the shoes of opposite wheels. A brake-bar.

brake-block, s.

Railroad engineering: The block attached to the brake-beam and holding the shoe or rubber.

brake shoe, s. That part of a brake which is brought in contact with the object whose motion is to be restrained.

brake-sieve, s.

Mining: A rectangular sieve operated by a forked lever or brake, from which it is suspended in a cistern of water for the agitation of comminuted ore. The meshes are of strong iron wire, ¼ of an inch square. The brake is supported by a rolling axis. [Jigger.] The poorest light pieces are cuttings. Pieces of poor, sparry, heavy ore are chats. (Knight.) brake-wheel, s.

1. Railroad engineering: The wheel on the platform or top of a carriage by which the brakes are put in action.

2. Machinery: A wheel having cams or wipers to raise the tail of a hammer-helve.

brāke (2), s. & a. [L. Ger. brake = brake, brushwood, connected with Ger. bruch = fallow-ground; Dut. braak (adj.) = fallow; Dan. brak = fallow, unploughed; and, perhaps, with Dan. bregne = fern-brake. Cf. also Wel. brwyn, brwyn = growth, brake; Arm. brūs, brug = heath, heather; Ir. & Gael. fraoch = heath; Prov. bres = heath.] [Bracken.]

A. As substantive:

1. A thicket of brushwood or fern; a place overgrown with prickly or thorny shrubs, with brushwood or with fern.

(1) Literally:

(a) Overgrown with prickly or thorny shrubs, as brambles and briars, or with brushwood. [Cane-brake.]

"That seem'd to break from an expanding heart:
'The untutor'd bird may found, and so construct,
And with such soft materials line, her nest,

bra-ma (1), s. [Lat. brama.]

Ichthyol.: A genus of spiny-finned fishes belonging to Cuvier's family Sparoidopennes, being Scaly-finned fishes, now called Chætodontidæ. It contains but one species, the Brama Raii, which is common in the Mediterranean, whence an occasional straggler finds its way to the British seas.

Bra-ma (2), s. [BRAHMA.]

Bra-mah, s. & a. [From Mr. Joseph Bramah, who was born at Stainborough, in Yorkshire, April 14, 1749, and died December 9, 1814.]

A. As substantive: Mr. Bramah, who invented the Bramah lock, the Bramah-press, &c.

B. As adjective: Invented by Mr. Bramah.

Bramah-lock, s. A lock patented by Bramah, in England (1784 and 1788), having a . . . tumbler-sides which are adjusted in the . . . of tumblers, by means of a stepped . . . at the sides of unequal length shall . . . into a position where their notches . . . the same plane, that of the locking-. . . .

Bramah-press, s. A machine designed to turn to account Pascal's Law [LAW] of the equality of pressure in a mass of liquid, by . . . water under pressure to produce . . . by force. It was patented by Mr. . . . Bramah in 1795. It is called also the Hydraulic or Hydrostatic Press. It consists essentially of a large, very strong cylinder, in the collar of which a cast-iron piston or ram works . . . . A screw-ram is a movable . . . plate, and at some distance higher . . . fixed cylinder, both being kept in their . . . by strong columns. The portion . . . between the ram is full of . . . and is connected by a pipe with a . . . pump. When the latter is put . . . it compresses the water in it, and . . . pressure transmitted by the pipe to the . . . in which the ram works, acts . . . on every part of it (PASCAL'S LAW), with the practical effect of enormously increasing the original force. Thus, if the . . . of the piston in the forcing pump is . . . of that of the ram in the cylinder . . . the pressure on the latter is . . . 4)² = 2,304 times greater than that exerted by the former. Goods to be pressed . . . before it, for instance, or beet-roots, are . . . the lower or movable plate, and . . . up against the fixed one. The portions of the Menai tubular bridge were raised to their positions by means of a powerful . . . press.

bra-ma-the-ri-ŭm, s. [From Brama, old specific name of BRAHMAN (q.v.); Gr. θηρίον (thērion) = wild beast.]

Zool. & Geol.: A genus of Antilopidæ, consisting of Indian species with four horns. It is also called Catheramium, which also is four-horned. It occurs in the Upper Miocene, or Lower Pliocene beds of the Siwalik hills in India.

(1) Generally:

(a) The blackberry or any allied plant. [II. 1. bot.]

"Both the bramble cumber a garden." It makes the better hedge where it is chained to prick the owner, it will tear the thief." Tusser. Camolughas Surv., bk. . . ch. 2.

(b) The common dog-rose, Rosa canina. [BRAMBLE-FLOWER.]

(2) Loc.: Any thorny shrub.

"The lush ivy hid, the bramble was my bow'r,
The woods rest witness many a woful store." Spenser.

2. Of animals: The same as brambling and bramble finch (q.v.).

II. Technically:

1. Botany:

(1) The blackberry, Rubus fruticosus, or any closely allied species of the same genus. The shrub now mentioned runs into a number of well-marked varieties. Hooker and Arnott, in the 7th edition of the British Flora (1855), enumerate seven: R. sulcatus, or the Erect; R. fruticosus, or the Common; R. rhamnifolius, or the Buckthorn-leaved; R. corylifolius, or Hornbeam-leaved; R. corylifolius, or the Hazel-leaved; R. glandulosus, or the Glandular; and R. cæsius, or the Dewberry Bramble. R. saxatilis, or the Stone Bramble, is made a distinct species. The above are European species, the American ones also are numerous. The raspberries are associated with the brambles in the same genus Rubus.

¶ Blue bramble (so called from the blue bloom on the fruit). A book-name for Rubus cæsius. (Britten & Holland.)

Heath bramble: Rubus cæsius. (Lyte.)

Mountain bramble: Rubus Chamæmorius. (Treasury of Bot.)

Stone bramble: A book-name for Rubus saxatilis. (J. Wilson.) (Britten & Holland.)

(2) The fruit of the bramble, called also blackberry.

† (3) A book-name for the whole genus Rubus, though it contains the raspberry as well as the bramble.

2. Scripture:

(1) The rendering of Heb. אָטָד (atad), translated bramble in Judges ix. 14, 15, and thorns in Psalm lviii. 9. The former passage shows that it was little regarded, the latter that it was thorny and used as fuel. Atad is supposed to be the same as Arab. ausaj = a kind of buckthorn, and is probably a rhamnaceous plant, Zizyphus spina Christi, because it is thought that from it was made the crown of thorns, which for purposes of insult and torture was placed around the sacred forehead of Christ immediately before his crucifixion (John xix. 2, 5).

(2) The rendering of the Heb. חוֹחַ (chhoah) in Isaiah xxxiv. 13, probably a thorny tree or shrub of the genus Prunus.

(3) [BRAMBLE-BUSH (2).]

B. As adjective: Consisting of or pertaining to the Blackberry (Rubus fruticosus) or any allied species of the genus. (See the compounds.)

bramble-bonds, s. pl. "Bonds" or bands made of the long shoots of the bramble. They were formerly used for thatching roofs (Ogilvie.) bramble-bush, s. [In Ger. brambeer-busch.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Bot.: The same as BRAMBLE (q.v.).

2. Scrip.: The rendering, in Luke vi. 44, of the Greek word βάτος (batos) = a bramble-bush. (Liddell & Scott.) bramble-finch, s. The same as BRAMBLING (q.v.).

bramble-flower, *bramble-flour, s.

1. The flower of a bramble, Rubus fruticosus.

*2. The dog-rose, Rosa canina.

"The bramble-flour that berest the red hepe." Chaucer: C. T., 13,678.

bramble loop, s. The loop or curve made by the stem of a bramble when the extremity of the long and feeble branch has rooted itself in the ground.

"We have heard of cows that were said to be mouse-crope, or to have been walked over by a shrew-mouse, the ancient way of accounting for paralysis, being arrested through the bramble-loop . . . —Prof. Buckman, in Times, 1st article R. Rose.

bramble-net, s. A net to catch birds.

† brām-bled, a. [Eng. bramble); -ed.] Thickly grown over with brambles.

"Beneath yon tow'rs o'ergrown and ragged, Fothoria she sits upon the . . . bed thou." T. Warton: Ode iii.

brām-bling, *brām-line, s. [Ger. brambling.] A bird, Fringilla montifringilla, called also Bramble Bramble-finch, Mountain-finch, and Mountain chaffinch. [MOUNTAIN-FINCH, FRINGILLINÆ.]

† brām-bly, a. [Eng. bramble); -y.] Full of brambles.

"Hark how they warble in that brambly bush
The gaudy cock-finch and the spink thereon." S. Brooke, Poet. 4

brāme, s. [Cf. O. Eng. brome = sevele, sharp; A.S. bremman = to rage, to roar.] Sharp passion.

"But that shee still did waste and still did wayle,
That, through long languour and hart-burning brame,
She shortly like a pyned ghost became." Spenser: F. Q., III., n. 52.

bra-mi-a, s. [From brami, the local name of the plant.]

Bot.: A genus or sub-genus of plants belonging to the order Scrophulariaceæ (Figworts). Bramia serrata has a slimy penetrating odour. It is used in Brazil in the preparation of bark for rheumatic patients. (Lindley.)

† Bra-min (1), s., † Bra-min-ē, s., &c. [BRAHMAN, BRAHMINEE, &c.]

Bra-min (2), Brach-man (ch silent), s. [In Ger. (sing.) Brachmane, Bramine; Lat. Brachmanus (pl. Brachmani); Pali Brahmana; O. Pali Bahuhan, Bahmana, Bahhana.] An ancient Indian sect mentioned by the Hindoo Boodhha, the Greek historian Arrian, and the Latin father Ambrose, and generally identified by the classic writers with the Gymnosophists. It is matter of dispute whether they were identical with the members of the Indian sacerdotal caste now universally known as Brahmans or were of Boodhhistic origin. Col. Sykes strongly maintained the latter view. (Journal Roy. Asiat. Soc., vol. vi., p. 461, &c.)

brā-m-mle, brām-mles, s. [Corruption of Eng. bramble.] [BRAMBLE.] (Scotch & N. of Eng. Dial.)

brān, *brānne, *bren, s. [From Fr. bran (1) the thicker part of the husk of ground corn, (2) sawdust, (3) faecal matter; O. Fr., Pr., & O. Sp. bran = bran; Low Lat. brannum, brennum, bren; Wel., Ir., & Gael. bran = bran, husk. Arm. brenn.]

1. Lit.: The skins or husks of ground corn, especially wheat, separated from the flour. The nutritive value of these husks increases as we proceed from the outside of the grain toward the interior. The outer skin, or coarse bran, is very indigestible, owing to the presence of a layer of silica. The inner skins, called pollards, are more nutritious, containing from 12 to 15 per cent. of nitrogenous matter, and from 20 to 30 per cent. of starch. Unless, however, they are ground very finely, they are apt to set up irritation of the bowels and diarrhœa. Though rich in nitrogen, bran appears to possess but little nutritive power. It may be of use to those who are well fed, and need a laxative, but to the poor who need nutriment it is of very little use. It is, however, of some commercial value, being largely employed in the feeding of horses and cattle, and in brightening goods during the processes of dyeing and calico-printing.

"The citizens were driven to great distress for want of victuals . . . bread they made of the coarsest bran, . . ." —Bageard.

2. Figuratively:

"Nature hath meal and bran, contempt and grace.
I'm not their father . . ." Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

bran-duster, s.

Milling: A machine in which the bran, as turned out of an ordinary bolt, is rubbed and fanned to remove as much as possible of the flour which yet adheres to it.

brăn, adv. [A contraction from brand.] (Used only in the expression bran-new.)

¶ Bran-new, i. e., brand-new: The brand was the fire, and bran-new was newly forged, fresh from the fire. It was equivalent to Shakespeare's fire-new. (Trench: English Past & Present, pp. 179, 180.)

"... a pair of bran-new velveteens, instead of his ancient blacksets. —Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. i.

* brăne, s. [Etymology doubtful.] A linen vestment like a rochet, formerly worn by women over their other clothing. (Ogilvie.)

* brăne-ard, s. [Fr. branard = a litter, the shafts of a vehicle.] A horse litter.

"The gentleman ... prop-sed, that he would either make use of a boat to Newport or Ostend, or a branard to St. Omer's. —Life of Lord Clarendon, iii. 291.

branch, * branche, * braunch, * braunche, s. & a. [From Fr. branche; Prov. branca (f.), and brancu (m.); Ital. branca; Low Lat. branca = the claw of a predatory animal; Wallachian brance = a foot; Arm. brank = a branch; Corn. b = an arm; Wel. braich = (1) an arm, (2) a branch, (3) a verse.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A shoot of a tree or other plant especially one from the main boughs, which again divides into minor branches or branchlets.

branch-work, s. [Branched-work.]

"Beneath branch-work of costly sardonyx, Sat smiling latus in aras. Tennyson: The Palace of Art.

branch, v.i. & t. [From branch, s. (q.v.).]

A. Intransitive:

1. Lit. Of trees: To separate into actual branches.

"... therefore those trees rise not in a body of any height, but branch near the ground. The cause of the plenty is the keeping in of the sap, long before it branch, and the spending of it when it beginneth to branch, by equal degrees. —Bacon.

2. Fig.: To separate into divisions. Used:

(1) Of material things. Spec., of a stag's horns: To separate into antlers.

(2) Of things immaterial or abstract:

"... that would beat instruct us when we should, or should not, branch into farther distinctions." —Locke.

¶ To branch out:

(1) Lit. Of trees: To separate into branches.

(2) Figuratively:

(a) Of things material: To separate into divisions widely apart.

"The ... ps at the one end, and the long range of Appenines that pass through the body of it, branch out on all sides, into several different chains." —Addison.

Zool.: A name sometimes given to those Lamellibranch mollusca which have the lobes of the mantle [illegible] classification of Lamarck, necessary. It is the same as branchifera (q.v.).

bran-chi-ŏp ŏd-a, s. pl. [From Gr. βραγχια (branchia), gills, and πους (pous), gen. ποδος (podos) = a foot.] Having [illegible] attached to the [illegible].

Zoology.

[illegible] first order of the subclass Entomostraca. The genera included under it, such as Cyclops, Cypris, Apus, Limnadia, branchipus, &c., are now generally ranked under several orders, viz., Copepoda, Ostracoda, and Phyllopoda. Milne Edwards places them under two, the Phyllopoda and the Cirripedia. See these terms.]

2. A division or "legion" of the subclass Edriophthalma. It includes the order Cladocera, Phyllopoda and Trilobita, perhaps with Mesostoma.

bran-chi-ó pode, s. [In Fr. branchiopode.] BRANCHIOPODA.]

Zool.: An animal belonging to the old order Branchiopoda.

bran-chi-ŏp-ŏ-dous, a. [From Eng. branchiopod(a), and suff. -ous.]

Zoology:

1. Having branchiæ attached to the feet.

2. Pertaining to the branchiopoda.

bran-chi ŏs tė-gal, a. [In Fr. branchiostegal. From Gr. βραγχια (branchia) = gills, and στεγος (stegos) = a roof, from στεγω (stegō) = to cover closely, to roof over.]

Zool.: Pertaining to the membrane covering the gills.

"Branchiostegal rays, Ichthy.: Parts of the hyoid apparatus supporting this membrane." (Harvey: Classification of Animals, p. 88.)

bran-chi-ŏs tė-gi (Mod. Lat.), bran-chi-ós tė-gans (Lat. pl.), s. pl. [From Gr. βραγχια (branchia) = gills, and στεγος (stegos) = a roof; στεγω (stegō) = to cover closely.]

Zool.: An old order of fishes with free branchiæ and a cartilaginous skeleton. It was suppressed by Cuvier. (Gray: Cuvier, bk. v., p. [illegible] note.

bran-chi-ŏs-tė-goŭs, a. [From Gr. βραγχια (branchia) = gills, στεγος (stegos) = a roof, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Zoology:

1. Covering the gills. [BRANCHIOSTEGAL.]

2. Possessed of a membrane covering the [illegible].

bran-chi-ŏs tóm a, s. [In Fr. branchiostome. From Gr. βραγχια (branchia) = gills, and στομα (stoma) = the mouth.]

Zool.: Costa's name for the very anomalous genus of Vertebrates now called Amphioxus (q.v.).

bran chi ŏt ó ca, s. pl. [From Gr. βραγχια (branchia), branchiæ, and τοκος (tokos) = [illegible] forth birth; τικτω (tiktō) = to bring forth.]

Zool.: The name given by Professor Owen to [illegible] of the Vertebrata comprehending the Batrachia and other Amphibia. He called them also [illegible].

bran-chi-pód id-æ, s. pl. [From Gr. βραγχια (branchia) = gills; πους (pous), genit. ποδος (podos) = a foot; and Lat. fem. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Entomostraca belonging to the order Phyllopoda. It contains the genera Branchipus and Artemia.

bran chi pus, s. [From Gr. βραγχια (branchia) = gills, and πους (pous) = a foot.]

Zool.: A genus of small Entomostraca, the typical species of the family Branchipodidæ (B. stagnalis), which inhabits the ditches near Blackheath and other places.

bran-chi-rė-me, s. [From Lat. branchiæ = gills, and remus = an oar.]

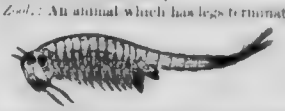
Zool.: An animal which has legs terminating in a bundle of uniform branchiæ, constituting a respiratory apparatus.



BRANCHIREME (CHIROCEPHALUS DIAPHANUS).

bran-chi-te, s. [Named after Prof. Branchi, of Pisa.]

Min.: A variety of Heulandite. It is colourless and translucent, and is found in the brown coal of Monte Vaso, in Tuscany.

branch less, a. [From Eng. branch, and suff. -less.]

1. Lit.: Without branches.

2. Fig.: Without any valuable product; naked.

"It [illegible] more honour
Those myself better [illegible] yours, Than yours branch'less are."

(BRAND, v. & s.). The second part is from Fr. & Sw. vin, Dan. vin, Ger. wein, Du. wijn, A. Dut. wegn.] (WINE.)

A. As substantive:

1. Formerly. (Of the forms brandwine and brennewine, etymologically meaning burnt or distilled wine.) (BRANDY-WINE.)

2. Now. (Of the form brandy, being the adjective in the foregoing compound disseverred from its associate wine, and made to stand alone as a substantive.) A spirit produced by the distillation of both white and red wines, prepared chiefly in the south of France. The brandy most esteemed in our land is that of Cognac, which is obtained by distilling white wines of the finest quality. An inferior kind of spirit is frequently prepared from the "marc" of grapes and the refuse of wine vats. When first distilled it is as colourless as alcohol, and continues so if kept in bottles or jars. When stored in casks, however, it acquires from the wood a pale amber tint, and in this state is sold as pale brandy. The dark colour of brown brandy is produced artificially, to please the public taste, by means of a solution of caramel, and this is frequently added in excess to give a rich appearance to a brandy of low quality. A large proportion of the brandy sold in this country is simply raw grain spirits flavoured and coloured. The spirit is exported from England and Germany into France, where it is redistilled and converted into French brandy. Brandy improves in flavour by being kept, but loses in strength. Genuine brandy consists of alcohol and water, with small quantities of œnanthic ether, acetic ether, and other volatile bodies produced in the process of fermentation. The value of brandy as a medicine depends on the presence of these ethers and other volatile products; when, therefore, it is adulterated with raw grain spirit and water, the amount of these ethers is so reduced that the brandy becomes almost valueless for medical purposes. In the United States brandy is made from cherries, apples, pears and peaches, while much common whisky is exported to France, from which, after manipulation, it is returned as brandy. A more legitimate manufacture of brandy goes on in California, where large quantities of pure wine brandy are annually produced and distributed through the States. The strength of brandy as sold varies from proof to 10 or even 10 under proof. Imitation brandy is prepared by flavouring highly-rectified spirit with essence of Cognac, or by distilling it with bruised prunes, acetic ether, argol, and a little genuine brandy. This is said to be greatly improved by keeping.

cruas = to flame; Dan. brase = to fry; possibly connected with Sanse. bhrāj = to fry. According to Dr. Murray there is no evidence of any connection between the two.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The yellow-coloured compound metal, consisting of an alloy of copper and zinc, described under II. 1.

†(2) Any article made of brass, a brass fitting. (Generally in the plural.)

"The very scullion who cleans the brasses."—Hugh Latimer. (Goodrich & Porter.)

(4) A monumental brass. [II 3.]

"If not by them on monumental brass"
Thompson: Liberty, v

(4) Musical instruments of brass, as distinct from those of wood. [BRASS-BAND, I (2) (b).]

(5) Money, both in Old English and modern slang, on account of the use of the metal in the coinage. [TIN, COPPERS.]

"And here here brass as the bakke, to coleyn to selle."
Piers Plow. "Vis., iii. 196.

2. Figuratively: Hardness, the typical quality of the metal. It is frequently in the Bible mentioned along with iron in a similar sense, as in the following cases:

(1) Strength for defence or attack.

"I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass: and thou shalt beat in pieces many people."—Micah iv. 13.

(2) Obstinacy in wickedness.

"They are all grievous revolters, walking with slanders: they are brass and iron; they are all corrupters."—Jer vi 28.

(3) Effrontery, impudence, shamelessness; incapability, like that of brass, either to yield or to change colour in circumstances where an ordinary being composed of flesh and blood would do so.

"Because I knew that thou art obstinate, and thy neck is an iron sinew, and thy brow brass."—Isa xlviii 4.

"... his forehead of brass and his tongue of venom ..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

II. Technically:

1. Metal, : An alloy of copper and zinc.

(1) In ancient times: It is said that when the Roman consul Mummius, after capturing the celebrated Grecian city of Corinth, barbarously burnt the place to the ground, in B.C. 146, various metals, fused in the conflagration, became united into a compound or alloy, called from the circumstances now stated Corinthian brass. This is often supposed to have been the first discovery of brass itself, but Assyriologists consider it to have been mentioned in cuneiform inscriptions, both Chaldean and Assyrian. (See an elaborate dissertation on the subject by Francis Lenormant, in the Bib. Arch. Soc. Transact., vol. vi., 1878, 334-417.) [2.]

(2) In modern times: Before zinc was obtained in its metallic form brass was manufactured from calamine (native carbonate of zinc) mixed with copper and charcoal. Even now this process is easier than the direct fusion together of the two metals. The proportion of copper and zinc vary. Ordinary brass is a yellow alloy of copper and twenty-eight to thirty-four per cent. of zinc. The density of cast brass is 7·8 to 8·4, that of brass wire 8·54. It is harder and yet more fusible than copper, more sonorous and a worse conductor of heat. It may be turned upon a lathe. It is extensively used for candlesticks, handles of doors, the framework of locks, mathematical instruments, &c., while in the state of wire it is much used in pin-making. [DUTCH GOLD.]

2. Scripture: The Heb. word for "brass" is נְחֹשֶׁת (nechhosheth), from נָחַשׁ (nachhash) = to shine. The metal thus designated evidently occurs in nature, for it is dug out of hills (Deut. viii. 9) and "molten out of the stone" (Deut. xxxiii. 25), which is not artificial alloy, brass, never yet has been ... most parts of the Old Testament "brass" should be altered into "copper," though occasionally in the later books of the Old Testament it may be bronze. In the New Testament, in 1 Cor xiii. 1, and Rev. ix. 20, the rendering is χαλκὸς (chalkos) = (1) copper, (2) bronze; whilst in Rev. i. and ii. it is χαλκολίβανον (chalkolibanon), probably = frankincense of a deep colour.

3. Arch. (pl.): Monumental engravings on brass plates let into slabs in the pavements of ancient churches, representing the effigies, coats of arms, &c., of illustrious personages. (Gloss. of Arch.)

MONUMENTAL BRASS.

4. Mech.: A pillow, bearing, collar, box, or bush supporting a gudgeon. The name is applied from its being sometimes of brass, though in various instances it is of bronze.

5. Mining: Iron pyrites. The name, which is a misnomer, is given from the lustre, which resembles that of brass.

B. As adjective: Consisting more or less of brass; brazen, resembling brass, in any way pertaining or relating to brass.

¶ Compounds of obvious signification: brass-bound (Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. ii., ch. v.); brass-headed (Pope: Homer's Iliad, xi. 19); brass-jarred (Spenser: F. Q., I. iv. 17); brass-studded (Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, iv.); brass-throated (Longfellow: The Spanish Student, iii. 1); brass-vizarded (Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humour).

brass band, s.

1. Literally:

(1) Gen.: A band of musicians performing upon instruments of brass.

(2) Spec.:

(a) The smaller variety of the military band, employed chiefly in cavalry regiments, on account of the greater ease with which brass instruments can be played on horseback. Those used are various: cornets, saxhorns, euphoniums, one or more bombardons, &c. (Grove.)

(b) One of the divisions of the "wind" of a full orchestra, consisting of trumpets, horns, trombones, and occasionally an ophicleide. [BAND, I.]

2. Figuratively. In political controversy, contemptuously: A party or a section of a party acting mostly in concert. Some years ago extreme Protestant controversialists denominated a knot of Roman Catholic members of Parliament voting together "the Pope's brass band."

brass foil, s. Very thin beaten sheet-brass, thinner than latten. It is called also Dutch gold.

brass-furnace, s. A furnace for fusing the metallic constituents of brass. These are melted in crucibles, the copper being first melted, and the zinc then added piecemeal, as it is vaporised by an excess of heat. The moulding-trough is on one side of the pouring or spill-trough, and the furnace is on the other. There is a core-oven, heated by the furnace, and serving to dry the cores for the faucets or other hollow articles which are cast. (Knight.) brass-powder, s. A powder made of brass, or anything resembling it. Two kinds are made.

1. Red-coloured: Ground copper filings or precipitated powder of copper with red ochre.

2. Gold-coloured: Gold-coloured brass or Dutch leaf reduced to powder.

¶ They are mixed with pale varnish, or else they can be applied by dusting over a surface which has been previously covered with varnish. (Knight.)

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 3

* (3) To give courage to, encourage.

B. Intransitive: To swagger about, show off.

"As at Troy must dastards of the Greekes Did brave about the corpse of Hector colde" Spenser: Ruines of Rome.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between the verbs to brave, to defy, to dare, and to challenge:—"We brave things; we dare and challenge persons; we defy persons or their actions: the sailor braves the tempestuous ocean, and very often braves death itself in its most terrific form; he dares the enemy whom he meets to the engagement; he defies all his hunstings and vain threats. . . . Brave and defy are dispositions of mind which display themselves in the conduct; dare and challenge are modes of action. We brave a storm by meeting its violence, and bearing it down with superior force; we defy the malice of our enemies by pursuing that line of conduct which is most calculated to frustrate its intentions. To brave conveys the idea of a direct and personal application of force to force; defying is carried on by a more indirect and circuitous mode of procedure: men brave the dangers which threaten them with evil, they defy the angry will which is set up to do them harm. To dare and challenge are both direct and personal, but the former consists either of actions, words, or looks; the latter of words only. . . . Daring arises from our contempt of others; challenging arises from a high opinion of ourselves: the former is mostly accompanied with unbecoming expressions of disrespect as well as aggravation; the latter is mostly divested of all angry personality. . . . We dare only to acts of violence; we challenge to any kind of contest in which the skill or the power of the parties are to be tried." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between bravery, courage, and valour:—"Bravery lies in the blood; courage lies in the mind: the latter depends on the reason, the former on physical temperament: the first is a species of instinct; the second is a virtue. A man is brave in proportion as he is without the fear: he has courage in proportion as he reasons and reflects. Bravery seems to be . . . voluntary, a mechanical movement of the . . . not depend on one's self . . . conviction, and gathers strength . . . in a noble and lofty sentiment of the . . . example, the charms of music, the . . . tumult of battle, the desperation of . . . fact, will make cowards brave; . . . man wants no other incentives than . . . his own mind suggests. . . . brāx-y, brāx-ēa, brāx-ĭt, brăcka, s. & a. [Possibly contracted from A.S. breca-seoc = the "breaking" sickness, the falling sickness, epilepsy; from brecc = broke, pa. tense of brecan = to break; Gael. braigeanih = braxy. Cf. also A.S. broc = disease, affliction, misery; and Gael. breac = small-pox.]

A. As substantive:

1. A disease in sheep. This term is frequently applied to totally different disorders, but the true braxy is undoubtedly an intestinal affection, attended with diarrhœa and retention of the urine. After young sheep have been weaned, they are apt to gorge themselves with grass, turnips, &c.; this produces a kind of colic, which usually ends in death. Again, when a lean flock of sheep is placed suddenly on rich food, or on coarse pasture of an indigestible nature, irritation and inflammation of the bowels set in, and this frequently proves fatal. In both cases the sheep are said to die of braxy. The duration of the disease is very short, in some cases terminating fatally in twenty-four hours. Hilly land is favourable to the production of braxy, and hence we find it far more prevalent in the Highlands of Scotland than in any other part of the country. The treatment of the disease is one of very great difficulty, but it may to a certain extent be prevented by regulating the animal's diet, and sheltering the flock during severe winter weather.

". . . . brazy or brazil, or the sickness . . . ."—Price Essay, Highl. Soc., iii. 340.

"Many are cut off by a disease which is here called the brazen."—Pur. of Lochaber: Pennant. Montr. Arc., iv. 6.

"Another malady preys upon the sheep here. Among the shepherds it is called the bracks."—Pur. of Barrie, ibid., iv. 242. (Jamieson.) ¶ Dumb brazy: The dysentery in sheep.

"The dumb brazy . . . . is distinguished from sickness by the season of the year in which it appears and by dysentery in the common form of a bloody flux."—Ess. Highl. Soc., iii. 416. (Jamieson.)

2. A sheep which has died of brazy.

"While Highlandmen hate tolls and taxes:
While mornlan herds like gaud fat brazies."
Burns: Epistle to William Simpson.

3. The mutton of such a sheep.

B. As adjective: Of or belonging to a sheep which has died of brazy.

¶ Brazy-mutton: The flesh of a sheep which has died of brazy. As the duration of the disease is very short, it may be assumed that the structures of the body have not been affected by it, and that the disease has been limited to the intestines. Every part of the sheep therefore is eaten, except the liver, the kidneys, and the intestines. As to its being wholesome food, Mr. J. Willison, one of the largest sheep-farmers in Scotland, who has had seventy years' experience, says, "In flavour brazy resembles grouse or black-game more than any food I have ever tasted. It is wholesome and very digestible, and in my long experience I have never known of any man, woman, or child having any disease or disorder of the human system from eating brazy. It should, however, be well cooked."

brāze, v.t. [From brass, s. In Fr. braser.]

1. Literally:

(1) To fix or solder in with an alloy of brass and zinc.

"If the nut be not to be cast in brass but only hath a worm brazed into it, this niceness is not so much necessary, because that worm is first turned up and bowed into the grooves of the spindle, and you may try that before it is brazed in the nut."—Moxon.

(2) To cover or ornament with brass.

"Full on the lance a stroke so lusth sped
That the broad falchion lopp'd its brazed head."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xvi. 444.

2. Fig.: To harden, to be hardened.

"I have so often blushed to acknowledge him that now I am brazed to it."—Shakesp.: King Lear, i. 4.

"If damned custom hath not brazed it so,
That it is proof and bulwark against sense"
Shakesp. Hamlet, iii. 4.

¶ In the Globe edition it is brassed instead of braz'd.

brā´-sen, brā´-zen, a [A.S. brasen, brasn = (1) brazen, made of brass, (2) strong, powerful. (Bosworth.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Made in whole or in part of brass

". . . inscribed on brazen tablets . . ."—Lewis: Anc. Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. v., § 7, vol. i., p. 147

2. Fig. (chiefly in poetry):

(1) Of an instrument resounding like brass: Loud, making noisy clangour.

"With loud and dissonant clangour Echoed the sound of their brazen instruments of sounding and casement." Longfellow: Evangeline, i. 6

(2) Of the larynx or "Oh soft . . . ding man: No more fo . . . than a flageolet would do the nature or effect of the sounds which it sends forth. (Contemptuously.)

"I mourn the pride
And avarice that makes man a wolf to man
Hear the faint echo of those brazen throats
By which he speaks the language of his heart"
Cowper: The Task, bk. v.

(3) Of the sounds sent forth by an instrument of brass: Loud, boisterous.

"Trumpets
With brazen din blast you the city's ear
Make mingle with your rattling tempests" Shakesp. Cor., iv. 6, p. 8.

(4) Of the forehead: As emphasised as if made of brass; possessed of effrontery, impudent, immodest.

"Talbot continued to frequent the court, appeared daily with brazen front before the princes whom ruin he had plotted. . . ."—Macaulay, Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

¶ The real adjective brasen is now more rarely used than it once was. It is being gradually displaced by the substantive brass used adjectively. The same process is at work with golden, beechen, &c.

II. Scripture & Theology: In the earlier parts of the Old Testament, brazen, in the authorised version, means made of copper; in some of the later parts it may mean made of brouze. Nowhere, apparently, in the Old Testament does it signify made of what we now call "brass." [Brass.] Connected with the Jewish tabernacle and the worship there offered there were "brasen" (or copper) vessels and utensils, as "brasen" censers (Num. xvi. 39), pots (Lev. vi. 28), a "grate of network" (Exod. xxvii. 4, xxxv. 16, xxxviii. 4), rings (ibid xxvii. 4), a laver (ibid. xxx. 18). (See also brazen-altar, brazen-sea, and brazen-serpent.)

¶ (1) Brazen age.

Myth.: The third of the four ages into which history was fancifully divided, each marking a new stage in the progress of degeneracy. [Age.]

(2) Brazen altar, brazen altar.

Jewish worship: (a) Connected with the tabernacle: An altar of "shittim wood," overlaid with plates of brass (copper?)

(b) Connected with the temple: An altar of burnt-offering, all of brass (bronze or copper?).

(3) Brazen dish.

Mining: The standard by which other dishes are gauged in England.

(4) Brazen sea.

Jewish worship: A large reservoir or tank of "brass" (bronze or copper?), connected with Solomon's temple, containing at the lowest estimate about 16,000 gallons. (1 Kings, vii. 2; 2 Chron. iv. 5.)

(5) Brazen serpent.

Jewish History and Theology: A serpent of "brass" (copper?), placed upon a pole and elevated in the sight of the Jewish people in the wilderness, that those bitten by fiery serpents looking at it in faith might be cured. (Num. xxi. 9.) Jesus draws a parallel between the lifting up of the serpent (upon a pole) and his own lifting up (upon the cross), as the object of faith for the attainment of eternal life. (John iii. 14, 15.)

brasen-browed, a. Having a forehead as incapable of blushing as if it was composed of brass; shameless, impudent.

"Noon-day vices, and brazen-browed iniquities."
Browne: Chr. Mor. i. 38.

brasen-clawed, a. Having claws of brass, or as capable of inflicting injury as if one had such claws.

"Demons produce them doubtless, brazen-claw'd." Cowper: Needless Alarm.

brasen-coloured, a.

Of the clouds: Of the colour of brass; brassy

"The clouds return into the hues of night,
Save where their brazen-dowered edges streak
The verge where brighter morns were wont to break."
Byron: Heaven and Earth, i. 2.

brasen face, s. An impudent person, one incapable of being put to shame. (Vulgar.)

"Well said, brazen-face! hold it out."
Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iv. 2.

brasen-faced, a. As incapable of feeling abashed or blushing as if the face were of brass.

"What a brazen-faced varlet art thou, to deny thou knowest me."—Shakesp. Lear, ii. 2 brasen-headed, a. Having a head or top literally of brass.

"Orthwartel with the brazen-headed spear."
Tennyson: Œnone.

brasen imaged, a. Resembling a brazen image in being manufactured by man.

"She-wolf! whose brazen imaged dugs impart
The milk of conquest yet within the dome."
Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 88.

brā sen, v.t. From brazen, a. (q.v.).] Impudently to maintain. (Generally followed by "it, it out," or some such expression.)

"When I reprimanded him for his tricks, he would talk saucily by, and brazen it out."—Arbuthnot † brā-sen-lȳ, adv. [Eng. brazen; -ly.] In a brazen manner; shamelessly, impudently.

"... the newest Eastern crusade ... which brazenly aspires to out-Times, 19th Dec., 1885. (Karl Sept. 17.)

BRAZIER (1).

brā-zi-ėr (2), † brā-zi-ėr * brasyere, s. [Formed from braze, v., or brass, s., with the suffix -ier = -er. Cf. glazier, &c.] An artificer who works in brass.

"Brasyere. Brasiator." Prompt. Parv.

"The halfpence and farthings in England, if you should sell them to the brazier, you would not lose above a penny in a shilling."—Swift bra-sil' (1), braz-il', * bra-syle, s. & a. [Fr. brésil; said to be from braise = burning cinders, the wood called in Fr. bresil being flame-coloured; perhaps a corr. of the Oriental name of the dye-wood (N.E.D.). It is not derived from Brazil, the country in South America, having had the name, which occurs in Chaucer and other writers, before the discovery by Europeans of the western continent. The reverse process has taken place: the country has been called from the wood, not the wood from the country.] [Brazil (2).

A. As substantive:

Bot., Comm., &c.: A kind of wood used for dyeing, and extensively imported into England from the West Indies. The best qualities of it are said to be produced by Cæsalpinia echinata. Other kinds are derived from the C. brasiliensis and C. crista. The former has timber which is elastic, tough, and durable, and which takes a fine polish. It is of a fine orange colour, full of resin, and yields by infusion a fine, full tincture.

"Him nedeth not his colour for to dien With Brasil, ne with grain of Portingal."
Lines in the MS. of Chaucer's C. T., in which the Nun's Priest's Tale is followed by that of the Nun. (Tyrwhitt.)

"Brasyle. Gaudo. Dicc., vel lignum Alexandrinum."—Prompt. Parv. (about A.D. 1440)

¶ Both the foregoing examples are earlier than the discovery of Brazil, the country. [Brazil.]

B. As adj.: Containing or constituting the wood described under A.

brasil-wood, s. The same as brasil (1) A (q.v.)

Bra-zil' (2), s. & a. [In Sw., Dan. & Ger. Brasilien; Dut. Brazilië; Fr. Brésil; Sp. & Port. Brasil, Brazil; Ital. Brasile. From brazil (1) (q.v.).] [Brazil-wood.]

A. As substantive:

Geog.: A country which was first sighted by the Portuguese Admiral Pedro Alvarez de Cabral, on May 3, 1500, some time later became a Portuguese colony, and on Oct. 12, 1822, was declared an independent State. It is situated in the great eastern angle of South America, between lat. 4°30′ N. and 33°40′ S., and long. 34°49′ and 72° W., and contains an area of about 3,275,326 square miles.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to the country described under A.

Brazil-nuts, s. pl.

Bot., Comm., &c.: The seeds of a Brazilian tree—the Bertholletia excelsa. It belongs to the order Lecythidaceæ. The "nuts" or seeds are largely exported from Para, whence they are sometimes called Para-nuts. They are eatable, besides which they yield on pressure an oil used by watchmakers and artists.

Brazil-tea, s.

Bot., Comm., &c.: A tree—the Mate (Ilex Paraguayensis), the leaves of which are used in South America as a substitute for Chinese or Indian tea.

Brazil-wood, s.

Bot., Comm., &c.: A name often given to the dye-wood brasil (1), which occurs in the country of Brazil, though it is not from it that the name was originally derived. [Brazil (1), etym., def., &c.]

brăz-il-ĕt tō, s. [In Fr. brésilette; Port. brasilete; dimin. of brasil (q.v.).]

Bot.: An English name of Cæsalpinia, a genus of leguminous plants constituting the typical one of the sub-order Cæsalpinieæ. The Narrow-leaved Brazilette, C. sappan, furnishes the sappan-wood used in dyeing red. [Sappan.] C. sepiaria, the Mysore Thorn, is so spinous that it constitutes an impenetrable fence. Hyder Ali planted it around fortified places. It is a scandent shrub. There are other species from the East or West Indies or South America.

brazilette-wood, s. The wood of Cæsalpinia brasiliensis. It is used for cabinet work.

Bra-zil'-i-an, a. & s. [In Ger. brazilianisch; Fr. Brésilien (s. & a. m.), Brésilienne (s. & a. f.).]

"In the land of the Brazilians."—Darwin: Voyage round the World, ed. 1870, ch. xxi., p. 400.

brā-zil-in, s. [From Brazil, and suff. -in.]

Chem.: A colouring matter, $C_{16}H_{12}O_5$, found in Brazil-wood. It crystallizes in yellow prisms, which give a crimson colour to a solution of ammonia. Brazilin is converted by nitric acid into styphnic acid, or trinitroresorcin, $C_6H(NO_2)_3(OH)_2$.

brāz-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [Braze, v.]

A. & B. As present participle & participial adjective: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

Metal.: The act of soldering together the surfaces of iron, copper, brass, &c., with an alloy composed of brass and zinc, sometimes with the addition of a little tin or silver. The surfaces to be united must be rendered perfectly clean [illegible] ight. The alloy, in granular form, is mixed with ground borax and water, dried, the pieces placed in contact and exposed to the heat of a clear fire, causing the solder to flow between them. This may be assisted by the use of a soldering-iron. (Knight.) brēach,  brēache, * breche (Eng.), * breche (Scotch), s. & a. [A.S. bryce, bryce, brece, gebrice = a breaking; Sw. brink = a breach; Dan. brik; Dut. breuk; Ger. bruch = a breaking, a rupture.; Fr. bris = a breaking; breche (see A., I., 3 d); Sp. & Port. brecha; Ital. breccia. Breccia, Break.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of breaking, or of breaking out.

(1) The act of breaking.

3. That which is broken. Spec.:

(1) Of things material:

(a) The shattered portion of a dilapidated house: the ground after an earthquake, or anything similar

"The priests had not repaired the breaches of the house." 2 Kings, xii. 6

"Thou hast made the earth to tremble; thou hast broken it: heal the breaches thereof; for it shaketh." Psalms, lx. 2.

(b) A broken limb, or anything similar.

"Breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth."—Lev., xxiv. 20.

† (c) An opening in a coast; a cliff, or anything similar.

"Till full he dashes on the rocky mounds, Where hoary shapeless breach his stream resounds."
Burns: Written with a Pencil, Falls of Fyers

(d) A hole, chasm, or rent in a fortification, made by battering guns, or anything similar, for the purpose of giving entrance to a storming party.

"Crowds of sailors and camp followers rushed into the city through the breach."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

(2) Of things immaterial or abstract:

(a) Gen.: In the foregoing sense.

"A wholesome tongue is a tree of life; but perverseness therein is a breach in the spirit."—Prov., xv. 4.

(b) Spec.: Broken friendship; difference between people mutually alienated; quarrel.

"To finish it; that so untimely breach
The Prince him seide halfe seemed to offend."

2. Scots Law. Breach of arrestment: The act of paying away money in one's hands on which a legal arrest has been laid, thus showing contempt for the law or its administrators.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between breach, break, gap, and chasm: "The idea of an opening is common to these terms, but they differ in the nature of the opening. A breach and a gap are the consequence of a violent removal, which destroys the connection; a break and a chasm may arise from the absence of that which would form a connection. A breach in a wall is made by means of cannon; gaps in fences are commonly the effect of some violent effort to pass through; a break is made in a page of printing by leaving off in the middle of a line; a chasm is left in writing when any words in the sentence are omitted. A breach and a chasm always imply a larger opening than a break or gap. A gap may be made in a knife; a breach is always made in the walls of a building or fortification; the clouds sometimes separate so as to leave small breaks; the ground is sometimes so convulsed by earthquakes as to leave frightful chasms. Breach and chasm are used morally; break and gap seldom otherwise than in application to natural objects." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

B. As adjective: Designed for breaking through the wall of a fortification. (See the compound which follows.)

breach-battery, s.

Mil.: A battery erected for the purpose of breaching the wall of a fortification.

(6) Bread and wine: The elements in the Holy Communion.

"She swore by bread and wine she would not break."
Shirley: & Fl.: Two Noble Kinsmen, iii. 5.

(7) Cuckoo's bread: A plant, Oxalis Acetosella.

(8) Tartar bread: The fleshy root of a plant, Crambe tatarica. (Treas. of Bot.)

(9) To be in bad bread: To be in a plight or dilemma. Probably it meant originally to be on short allowance.

II. Technically:

1. Baking: Loaves or cakes made from the flour of wheat, rye, or some other grain, and baked.

(1) Hist.: The art of baking bread is very ancient. It was known to the Egyptians, the Hebrews, the Greeks, the Romans, and other nations. In England, bread was made with yeast in 1634. Machinery was used in its production in 1858. Aerated bread was made in 1859, having been in use some years earlier in the United States.

(2) Modern process of manufacture: There are two kinds of bread, leavened and unleavened. Leavened, or fermented bread, is prepared by mixing together certain quantities of flour, warm water, salt and yeast, or leaves. After the lapse of some time fermentation sets in, and the dough, or sponge as it is called, becomes permeated with carbonic acid gas, a small quantity of alcohol being also formed. As soon as the mass is in a brisk state of fermentation, fresh portions of flour and water are added, and the whole thoroughly mixed or kneaded. The dough is next cut and shaped into loaves, and these, after being left for about two hours, during which they swell to nearly double their size, are then ready for the oven. The heat of the oven checks the fermentation, and expels all the alcohol, and most of the carbonic acid gas.

The art of bread-making consists in producing a light, porous crumb, and a pale-colored crust. The crumb should consist of dextrine, starch, gluten, and from 35 to 40 per cent. of water. The crust should consist almost entirely of dextrine.

Leaven, which is now seldom used in this country, is a mixture of flour, potatoes, and water, kept in a warm place till it begins to ferment.

Unleavened, or unfermented bread, is of two kinds. In the one, flour and water only are used, and this produces a heavy and compact bread. In the other, an acid and a carbonate are added for the purpose of disengaging carbonic acid gas, which, in imitation of yeast, raises the dough and renders the bread light and porous. The substances used are carbonate of ammonia or carbonate of soda, in combination with hydrochloric or tartaric acids. None of these ingredients are deleterious; but by far the best is carbonate of ammonia, as it is entirely driven off in the oven.

Aerated bread is prepared by forcing pure carbonic acid gas into the dough contained in a strong iron vessel. When this carbonated dough is introduced into the oven the gas expands and escapes, leaving the bread light and porous. Brown bread is ordinary white bread with from 15 to 20 per cent. of fine bran.

Whole meal bread, made from unsifted ground wheat, is the only true brown bread, being richer in nutrients than white bread. The amount of nitrogenous matter in white bread varies from 5 to 8 per cent., whilst in whole meal bread it rises to 14 per cent.

The adulteration of bread is carried on to a large extent, more especially in London. The quality of a loaf is very frequently judged by its whiteness; when, therefore, an unscrupulous baker has used an inferior or damaged flour, he finds that by adding alum or sulphate of copper, he is able to produce a loaf equal in whiteness to one made from the finest flour. These two substances are, however, dangerous adulterants. They not only render the bread indigestible, but when taken into the system for any length of time, are apt to disorder the stomach and produce various diseases. It should also be remembered that sulphate of copper is a poison.

Boiled rice, beans, and potatoes are also frequently used to adulterate bread. They are harmless in themselves, but are added for cheapness, and to increase the weight of the loaf, these substances retaining more water than wheat flour. In a recent experiment it was proved that when half-a-pound of rice flour was substituted for half-a-pound of wheat flour in a two-pound loaf, the loaf was found to contain five per cent. more moisture than that found in a loaf made from pure wheat flour. [SHIP-BREAD, CASSAVA-BREAD.]

2. Theology:

(1) The first of the two elements in the communion.

¶ To break bread: To partake of the communion.

¶ To break bread with: To eat with; to partake of one's hospitality.

(2) With reference to the descent of manna in the wilderness. Christ or his death accepted by faith as the spiritual nourishment of the soul.

"I am the bread of life."—John, vi. 35. (See the whole passage, 31—58.)

3. Zool.: Crumb of bread sponge. (Grant.)

B. As adj.: Consisting of or resembling bread, or in any way pertaining or relating to it.

¶ Compound of obvious signification: Bread crust. (Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. i., ch. iii.

bread-artist, s. A contemptuous appellation for one whose thoughts are exclusively occupied with the routine of labour for his daily bread.

"Here, circling like the gimbaux [q.v.] in parts or total blindness is no evil, the Bread-artist can trace contentedly round and round, still fancying that it is forward and forward."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. ii., ch. iv.

bread-crumb, s. A fragment of the soft part of bread; spec., if broken off from the rest.

"... my supper (bread-crumb) boiled in milk"—Cuckoo: Barker Rewritten, bk. II., ch. iii.

bread-fruit, s. & a.

A. As subst.: The fruit of the tree described below. It is about the size and shape of a child's head. The surface is reticulated; the skin is thick, the eatable part lying between it and the core. The latter is snow-white, and about the same consistence as new bread. It is first divided into three or four parts, and then roasted, or it may be taken boiled, or fried in palm oil. It is extensively used in the South Sea Islands and elsewhere, but is not much appreciated by Europeans.

B. As adj.: Producing the fruit described under A.

Bread fruit tree: The English name of Artocarpus incisa, a tree of the order Artocarpaceæ. [ARTOCARPUS.] It has pinnatifid leaves with sinuations, whilst the allied Jack-fruit, Artocarpus integrifolia, as its name imports, has them, as a rule, entire. Some, however, think the two species not properly distinct. For the fruit of the bread-tree see above. [BREAD-FRUIT.] The wood is useful; the inner bark may be made into cloth; the male catkins serve for tinder, and the juice for birdlime, or as a cement for broken crockery. The tree grows in the South Sea Islands and in the East Indies. From the former place it was introduced into the West Indies in 1793, and thence to South America. [BLIGHIA, etym.]

bread-knife, s. A knife for cutting bread. A special form is pivoted at one end to a post on a table, and used by a vertical motion.

* bread-lepe, s. [A.S. bread, and leap = a basket.] A bread-basket.

"... me dremte ic bar bread-lepes thra."—Story of Gen. & Exod., 2,078.

bread-making, a. Making or designed to be used in making bread.

Bread-making machine: A machine in which flour and water are mixed and kneaded. In some machines of this character the dough is rolled flat and cut into loaves, which are laid aside to rise before baking. [BREAD.]

bread-nut, s.

Bot.: The English name of Brosimum, a genus of plants doubtfully placed at the end of the Urticaceæ (Nettleworts). The fruit of the Brosimum Alicastrum, or Jamaica bread-nut, tastes like chesnut, and has been used to sustain negroes and others during times of scarcity.

bread-rasp, s. A rasp used by bakers in removing the burned crust of loaves and rolls, especially of French rolls.

bread-room, s.

Naut.: A "room," or portion of the hold of a ship separated from the rest, and designed to furnish a place for the bread and biscuit on board.

bread-root, s.

Bot.: The English name of the Psoralea esculenta, a papilionaceous plant with quinate leaves and dense axillary spikes of flowers. It is cultivated in Missouri for its roots, which are eaten like potatoes.

bread-slicer, s. The same as bread-knife (q.v.)

† bread-study, s. An appellation for a profession, calling, or occupation, viewed as a means of gaining a livelihood.

"Is it not well that there should be what we call Professions, or Bread-studies (Brodstwerke), preappointed for...?"—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. II., ch. iv.

bread stuff, s. The materials used in making bread.

† bread-tree, s.

1. The same as bread-fruit tree (q.v.).

2. The name given in North Australia to Cycadeæ edulis, called also Alibertia edulis.

bréad (1), v.t. [BREAD, s.]

1. To dress with bread-crumbs for cooking.

2. To clean by rubbing with bread-crumbs.

bread-bèr ry, s. [From Eng. bread, and perhaps the Eng. border dialectic word berry = to beat; O. Sw. baerta; Icel. berja = "bruised bread."] That food of children which in England is called "pap."

"We see before a peevish nurse would learn to bring ... 'arse and down stairs with a posset of her ... laurd or lady."—Mercur. Cælest., Jan., 16... [illegible]

* bré. ... -ip-pĕr, s. [Eng. bread; chipper.] One who chips bread; a baker's servant; an under butler.

"No abuse, Hal, o' my honour; no abuse.—Not to dispraise me, and call me pantler, and bread-chipper, and I know not what!"—Shakesp.: 2 Hen. IV., ii. 4.

† brŏad'-corn, * brod-cosrne, s. [Eng. bread; corn. In Ger. bradkorn.] Corn or grain of which bread is made. Spec., corn to be ground into bread-meal for brown bread (Skeat.)

"There was not one drop of beer in the town: the bread and bread-corn sufficed not for six days."—Haywood.

brĕad'-ĕd (1), a. [BREAD (1), v.] Dressed with bread-crumbs.

* bread'-ed (2), pa. par. & a. [BRAIDED.]

"Her golden locken she roundly did uptye
In bred to t trunels, that no lauser hoares Did out of order stray about her daintie eares."
Spenser: F. Q., II. ii. 15

† brĕad'-ĕn, a. [Eng. bread; -en.] Made of bread.

¶ Breaden god: A contemptuous appellation for the wafer used in celebrating the mass.

"Antichristians, and priests of the breaden god."—Rogers on the Creed (1585), Pref.

"He consulted with the oracle of his breaden god, which, because it answered not, he cast into the fire."—Bp. Hall: Honour of the Married Clergy, III. 8.

"The idolatry of the mass, and adoration of the breaden god."—Wade: Apostacy of the Latter Times, P. I.

¶ Trench says it occurs as late as Oldham. (Trench: Eng. Past and Present, p. 118.) It is still sometimes employed by extreme Protestant controversialists.

brĕad'-lĕss, a. [Eng. bread; and suff. -less = without.] Without bread; not having been able to obtain bread.

"Plump peers, and breadless bards alike are dull."—P. Whitehead: State Dunces.

* bread'-lin-gis, adv. [Scotch bread = broad, and suffix -lingis.] Broadwise, with the flat end of a sword or other weapon.

"... and straik ane of them breadlingis with his sword."—Bannatyne's Journal, p. 172.

* bread'-sword, s. [BROADSWORD.] (O. Scotch.)

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit. Of things material: The width of any surface or solid, as contradistinguished from the length of the former and the length and thickness of the latter. In general it differs from length by being less in amount than it, and from thickness by being more, or by being on the surface while thickness is represented by a certain amount of depth. [HANDBREADTH.]

"That he ... ed this load in brede & in length."—R. Brunne, p. 41.

"... a ... length was as large as the breadth of it. ... & the leght and the breadthe, & the heygth of it wer equall."—Bible (1551), Apoc. cxi.

"... that a man myght nat se the breisthe of an acre of land fro hym."—Berners: Froissart. Cronycle, vol. I., ch. 130.

"A cubit shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof."—Exod. xxx. 2.

2. Fig. Of things not material:

(1) Gen.: Mentally conceived of as vast in literal breadth.

"... the breade, and the lengthe, and the highnesse, and the depenesse ..."—Wycliffe (Purvey): Eph. iii. 18.

"May be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height: and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, ..."—Ephes. iii. 18, 19.

(2) Spec. Of a doctrine or statement: Absence of careful limitation.

II. Technically:

1. Shipwrighting: The thwart measure of a ship at any designated place. The beam is the extreme breadth; that is, at the widest part.

2. Painting: "Breadth" of effect, or simply "breadth," is the quality of giving prominence to the leading features of a painting by colours massively laid on, bright lights, dark shadows, and similar effects, rather than crowding the canvas with a multiplicity of less important details.

B. As adjective: Of or belonging to the width of anything; marking the width.

Shipwrighting. A line of the ship lengthwise, following the curve indicated by the ends of the timbers.

† brĕadth'-lĕss, a. [Eng. breadth; and suff. -less.] Without breadth.

"The term of latitude is breadthless line."—More: Song of the Soul, II. ii. 2.

brŏad'-win-nĕr, s. [Eng. bread; winner.]

1. Lit. (of persons): One who, by means of his labour, wins bread. Specially used of a father winning "bread" for his wife and children.

"We were saddled with his family, which was the first taste and proving of what war is when it comes into our hearths, and among the bread-winners."—Ann. of the Par., p. 102.

† 2. Fig.: Any instrument of a profession, by the use of which one earns a sustenance. (Jamieson.)

"The gang ham... and then get my bread-winner" [he meant his ride...]—Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xxiv.

bréak, * brĕ...ke, * breke, * brek-en, * bree-ken, * brak-yn, * brek-yn (pret. broke, † brake, * brec, * brek, * brak, * brac, * breec; pa. par. broken, † broke, * brok, * (broken), v.t. & i. [A.S. brecan, pret. bræc, gebræc, pa. par. brocen, gebrocen = (1) to break, vanquish, overcome, weaken, open, move, excite, produce; (2) to sail (Bosworth); O.S. brecan; Icel. brâka; bruka; Sw. bruka, bråka; Dan. bræekke; Dut. breken, verbreken; O. Ger. prechan; Lat. frango, from the root frag [FRAGMENT]; Gr. ῥήγνυμι (rhēgnumi) = to break. Cf. also ἐρείκω (ereikō) = to rend, to shiver; Sanse. bhrag, prag = to break; Heb. פָּרַק (paraq) = to break. Break was manifestly imitated from the sound of wood, or some other material substance, in process of being fractured. Break was originally the same word as breach, and it is cognate with wreck.] [BREACH, WRECK.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally. With a material thing for an object:

1. To cause any material thing to separate into two or more fragments by means of a blow or other violence applied to ... overcomes its cohesion.

(1) To do so by the hand or ... an instrument which produces an irregular fracture instead of a cut.

"The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars: yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon."—Ps. xxix. 5.

¶ It may be used also of anything composed of separate portions or atoms more loosely cohering than is the case in a material thing of ordinary tenacity.

"... the Puritan warriors ... never failed to destroy and break in pieces whatever force was opposed to them."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. i.

(2) To do so by means of an instrument causing a clean cut instead of a fracture. [See ¶ 1. To break a deer.]

2. To burst open anything closed or obstructed by applying force to it, to clear a passage, to make a hole through anything.

"Into my hand he forced the tempting gold, While I with modest struggling broke his hold."
Gay.

"O could we break our way by force!" Milton.

3. Of the bones and joints: To break the bones or to dislocate the joints. [See C. To break one's arm, leg, &c.]

4. Of a blow, a falling body, &c.: To intercept, to arrest the descent or the progress of, to mitigate the severity or lighten the effects of a fall. (Lit. & fig.)

"As one condemn'd to leap a precipice,
Who sees before his eyes the depth below,
Stops short, and looks about for some kind shrub
To break his dreadful fall." Dryden.

"She held my hand, the destin'd blow to break,
Then from her rosy lips began to speak." Ibid.

5. Of light: To penetrate, to pierce, to diffuse itself among.

"By a dim winking lamp, which feebly broke
The gloomy vapour, he lay stretch'd along."
Dryden.

II. Figuratively: To tame, to subdue, to teach to obey, to render more or less docile or manageable.

1. With one of the inferior animals for its object:

"To break the stubborn colt, to bend the bow."
Dryden.

"Such a horse is well broken; . . . . . "—Darwin: Voyage round the World (ed. 1870), ch. viii., p. 153.

¶ In this sense often followed by in, especially when used of a horse as yet untamed. [See break-in.]

2. With man for its object:

(1) To tame, to subdue.

"Why, then thou canst not break her to the lute?
Why, no; for she hath broke the lute to me."
Shakesp.: Tam. of the Shrew, ii. 1.

¶ Often followed by of in such an expression as to "break a person of a habit."

(2) To dismiss from office.

"I see a great officer broken."—Swift.

(3) To render bankrupt.

"Attracts all fees, and little lawyers breaks."
Dryden.

"A command or call to be liberal, all of a sudden impoverishes the rich, breaks the merchant, and shuts up every private man's exchequer."—South.

3. With an immaterial thing for its object:

(1) Of the health or strength: To impair, to shatter. [C. 14 (2) (b).]

"Have not some of his vices weaken'd his body, and broke his health?"—Tillotson.

(2) Of the will or the temper of one of the inferior animals, or of man:

"Behold young Juba, the Numidian prince,
With how much care he forms himself to glory,
And breaks the fierceness of his native temper."
Addison.

"For to bend and break the spirits of men gave him pleasure: . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

(3) Of the heart, the feelings, or emotions:

"I'll brave her to her face,
I'll give my anger its free course against her:
Thou shalt see, Phœnix, how I'll break her pride."
Philips.

† (4) Of the "brains," or intellect: To injure, to weaken.

"If any dabbler in poetry dares venture upon the experiment, he will only break his brains."—Felton.

(5) Of the voice: [B., II. 4.]

(6) Of any immaterial thing capable of violation: To violate, to infringe; to act contrary to. Used specially—

(a) Of hours.

"Lovers break not hours,
Unless it be to come before their time;
So much they spur their expedition."
Shakesp. Two Gent. of Verona, v 1

(b) Of promises, vows, contracts, or anything similar.

"When I break this oath of mine" Shakesp.: Love's Labour Lost, v 2.

". . . and I said, I will never break my covenant with you."—Judg. ii. 1.

(c) Of laws, human or Divine.

"Unhappy man! to break the pious laws Of nature, pleading in his children's cause."
Dryden.

(7) Of any immaterial thing capable of having its continuity interrupted: To interrupt for a greater or less length of time. Used of—

(a) Peace.

"Did not our worthies of the house,
Before they broke the peace, break vows?"
Hudibras.

(b) Sleep.

"Some solitary cloister will I choose,
Coarse my attire, and short shall be my sleep, Broke by the melancholy midnight bell."
Dryden.

(c) Speech, or the voice.

"Break their talk, Mistress Quickly; my kinsman shall speak for himself."—Shakesp.: Merr. Wives, III. 4.

"The father was so moved, that he could only command his voice, broke with sighs and sobbings, so far as to bid her proceed. —Addison.

(d) Silence.

"The poor shade shiv'ring stands, and must not break
His painful silence, till the mortal speak."—Pickell.

(e) A fast. [BREAKFAST.]

(f) Company or companionship.

"Did not Paul and Barnabas dispute with that vehemence, that they were forced to break company"—Atterbury.

B. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of material things:

(1) To separate into two or more portions, generally with some suddenness and noise, in consequence of force applied to produce the rupture.

". . . and like a glass Did break i' the rinsing."
Shakesp. Hen. VIII., i. 1.

46. To break upon the wheel: To punish by stretching a criminal upon the wheel, and breaking his bones with bats.

47. To break with:

(1) To make a communication to; to open one's mind to.

"Stay with me awhile;
I am to break with thee of some affairs
That touch me near."
Shakesp.: Two Gent. of Ver., iii. 1.

†(2) To intimate dissent from an opinion, or from those holding it.

". . . . and would break with any church in the world upon this single point; and would tell them plainly, if your religion be too good to be examined, I doubt it is too bad to be believed."—Tillotson (3rd ed., 1722), vol. i., ser. iv.

(3) To quarrel with; to cease to be friendly with.

"Can there be anything of friendship in snares, hooks, and trejsies? Whosoever breaks with his friend upon such terms, has enough to warrant him in so doing, both before God and man."—South

¶ (a) Crabb thus distinguishes between to break, to rack, to rend, and to tear:—"The forcible division of any substance is the common characteristic of these terms. Break is the generic term, the rest specific: everything racked, rent, or torn is broken, but not vice versâ. Break has, however, a specific meaning, in which it is comparable with the others. Breaking requires less violence than either of the others: brittle things may be broken with the slightest touch, but nothing can be racked without intentional violence of an extraordinary kind. Glass is quickly broken; a table is racked. Hard substances only are broken or racked; but everything of a soft texture and composition may be rent or torn. Breaking is performed by means of a blow; racking by that of a violent concussion; but rending and tearing are the consequences of a pull."

(b) To break, to bruise, to squeeze, to pound, and to crush are thus discriminated:—"Break always implies the separation of the component parts of a body; bruise denotes simply the destroying the continuity of the parts. Hard, brittle substances, as glass, are broken; soft, pulpy substances, as flesh or fruits, are bruised. The operation of bruising is performed either by a violent blow or by pressure; that of squeezing by compression only. Metals, particularly lead and silver, may be bruised; fruits may be either bruised or squeezed. In this latter sense bruise applies to the harder substances, or indicates a violent compression; squeeze is used for soft substances or a gentle compression. The kernels of nuts are bruised; oranges and apples are squeezed. To pound is properly to bruise in a mortar so as to produce a separation of parts; to crush is the most violent and destructive of all operations, which amounts to the total dispersion of all the parts of a body. What is broken may be made whole again; what is bruised or squeezed may be restored to its former tone and consistency; what is pounded is only reduced to smaller parts for convenience; but what is crushed is destroyed."

(c) The following is the distinction between to break, to burst, to crack, and to split:—"Break denotes a forcible separation of the constituent parts of a body. Burst and crack are onomatopœias, or imitations of the sounds which are made in bursting and cracking. Splitting is a species of cracking that takes place in some bodies in a similar manner without being accompanied with the noise. Breaking is generally the consequence of some external violence; everything that is exposed to violence may without distinction be broken. Bursting arises mostly from an extreme tension; hollow bodies, when over filled, burst. Cracking is caused by the application of excessive heat, or the defective texture of the substance: glass cracks; the earth cracks; leather cracks. Splitting may arise from a combination of external and internal causes; wood in particular is liable to split. A thing may be broken in any shape, form, and degree; bursting leaves a wide gap; cracking and splitting leave a long aperture; the latter of which is commonly wider than that of the former." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) brēak, * brāke, * brek, * broke, s. & a. [A.S. gebræc, gebræce, gebrece = a breaking, crash, noise. In Dut. breuk; Sw. brott; Dan. brud; Ger. brechen, bruch.] [BREAK, v.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of breaking.

(1) Lit.: The act of breaking any material thing.

(2) Figuratively:

(a) The act of breaking anything not material; a breach

(b) The act of breaking forth.

¶ The break of day.

"Sleep—and at break of day I will come to thee again!"
Wordsworth: Pet Lamb

2. The state of being broken.

"Our reformed churches agreeing soundly in all the substantial points of faith, & without break of communion, . . ."—Forbes: Defence, p. 5.

3. The portion of anything broken through

(1) Lit. Of things material:

(a) Gen.: An opening, passage, gap, or hole through anything

". . . through the breaks and openings of the woods that grow about it."—Addison

". . . the currents in the transverse breaks which connect the longitudinal channels. —Darwin: Voyage round the World (ed. 1870), ch. xv., p. 32.

(b) Specially:

(i) A kind of furrow in ploughing. (Scotch.)

"The field which is designed for bear gets two furrows, the one a break, the other clean."—Surv. Banffs., App., p. 87.

(ii) Of a hill: A hollow part. [In Icel. brecka is = a declivity.]

(iii) A division of land in a farm. (Scotch.)

"They shall dung no part of their former crofting, till these four new breaks are brought in. Let them give ten or twelve bolls of lime to each acre of their outclosed break."—Maxwell: Sel. Trans., p. 216.

(iv) Of a figure drawn: An interrupted portion.

"The surrounding zones likewise show traces, as may be seen in the drawing (fig 83), of indentations, or rather breaks, . . ."—Darwin: Descent of Man (1871), pt. ii., ch. xiv, vol. ii., p. 136.

(v) Of anything written or printed: A line to mark that the sense is suspended or that something is omitted.

"All modern trash is Set forth with num'rous breaks and dashes."
Swift

(2) Fig. Of things not material: A pause, an interruption.

"Thy constant flow of love, that knew no fall,
Ne'er roughened by those cataracts and breaks
That humour interposed too often makes.
Cowper: On the Receipt of my Mother's Picture.

4. That which breaks. [II. 10, 11.]

II. Technically:

1. Cricket: The twist of a ball as it is bowled, generally spoken of a twist or turn from the off side.

2. A precipice fitted to break the neck of any one who falls over it. (Lit. & fig.)

"I must
Forsake the court: to do't or no, is certain
To me a breakneck."
Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, I. 2.

B. As adjective: Fitted to break the neck; in which the neck is likely to be broken.

"Alas, and the leaps from raft to raft were too often of a breaknock character. ..."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. III., ch. IX.

"This way the chamois leapt: her nimble feet
Have baffled me; my gains to-day will scarce Repay my break neck trust all."
Byron: Manfred, I. 2.

* brēak-prŏm-ĭse, s. [Eng. break; promise.] One who habitually breaks his promise.

"I will thank you the most pathetical break promise and the most hollow lover."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, IV. 1.

Ichthyology & Ordinary Language:

1. Spec.: The Carp Bream, Abramis brama. It is of a yellowish-white colour, which changes, through age, to a yellowish-brown. The sides are golden, the cheeks and gill-covers silver-white, the fins light-coloured, tinged, the ventral one with red and the others with brown. It is found in the Regent's Canal, in London, and in the Medway and the Mole. It is sought after by anglers, who, however, consider the flesh insipid.

"And many a bream and many a luce in stewe."
Chaucer C. T., Prol., 348.

"The bream, being at full growth, is a large fish."
Walton Angler.

2. Her.: The English name of the several fishes belonging to the family Cyprinidæ and the genus Abramis. Three are described by Yarrell as British: (1) the Bream or Carp Bream (Abramis brama), already described (see 1); (2) the White Bream or Bream-flat (A. blicca); and (3) the Pomeranian Bream (A. Buggenhagii). Though the White Bream is common on the Continent, yet it is rare in England; the Pomeranian Bream is still rarer.

"Which said querristers, after their breasts are changed, &c."—Strype Life of Abp Parker, p. 9.

¶ To have a good breast: To have a good voice: to be a good singer.

"In singing, the sound is originally produced by the action of the lungs, which are so essential an organ in this respect that to have a good breast was formerly a common periphrasis to denote a good singer."—Hist. of Music, vol. iii., p. 468. (Nares.)

(b) Of the breast viewed as the seat of the emotions, of the appetites, of conscience, of courage, &c.:

(i) As the seat of the emotions in general:

"If happiness has not her seat
And centre in the breast."
Burns Epistle to Davie.

"Needless was written law, where none opprest;
The law of man was written in his breast."
Dryden.

(ii) As the repository of secrets.

¶ To make a clean breast:

(a) To confess all that one has kept secret about anything what he has been charged with, or which, without being accused, he still feels constrained to reveal; to make a full and ingenuous confession.

"... to make a clean breast of it before she died."—Scott St Ronan's Well, ch. xxxviii.

(b) To tell one's mind bluntly or without circumlocution.

". . . . and at the same time open, as it were, a window to the outer world through which an occasional breath of every day English sentiment might flutter the self-absorption of university life"—Times, Nov. 17, 1877.

II. Technically:

1. Physiol.: For details regarding the organic machine on the action of which breathing depends, see Lungs. For the process of breathing itself see Respiration. From 350 to 400 cubic feet of air are drawn into the lungs in 24 hours. The air expired is different, both in volume and composition, from that which was respired. Each hour an adult man takes in 450 to 550 grains of oxygen, and emits in the same period about 632 grains of carbonic acid, about 45 to 50 grains of nitrogen, and 9,720 grains of watery vapour Hence a continued supply of fresh air, laden with oxygen, is needful to maintain life. For the want of it, out of 146 prisoners shut up in the "Black Hole" of Calcutta, which was not a hole at all but only a room too small for its occupants, 123 perished in eight hours, as did 260 out of 300 Russian prisoners confined in a cave after the battle of Austerlitz. [Air.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A garment worn to cover the lower part of the body; drawers. (Originally used of the dress of women as well as of men, but now confined to the latter.)

(a) Very rarely in the singular.

"The womanes worn breech as well as men."—Maunderille: Voiage, p. 250.

"That you might still have worn the petticoat,
And me of had stol'n the breech from Lancaster."
Shakesp.: 3 Hen. VI., v. 5.

(b) Now only in this sense in the plural.

". . . and shall have linen breeches upon their loins; they shall not gird themselves with anything that causeth sweat."—Ezek xliv. 18.

"Young, royal Tarry Breeks."

". . . stoles, albs; chlamydes, tunes, Chinese silks, Afghaun shawls, trunk-hose, leather breeches, Celtic philibegs . . ."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. i., ch. v.

¶ The Jewish priests wore linen breeches (Exod xxviii 42, xxxix 28; Levit. xvi 4). In classical times breeches were worn only by the non-Roman and non-Grecian nations.

(2) Sing.: The hinder part of the person, covered by the trowsers. (Hayward.)

2. Figuratively:

(1) The hinder part of anything. [II. 1.]

(2) To have the breeches, to wear the breeches: To be master. (Said of wives who rule their husbands.)

"Proverbs, being a most cruel woman, and wearing her husband's breeches."—Heath: Flatterer. (Davies.)

"I see, Lopez, you give way unto the speeches too. But they will have on."

Beaum. & Fletcher: Woman Pleased, v. 4.

II. Technically:

1. Firearms and Ordnance: The rear portion of a gun; the part behind the chamber.

2. Shipbuilding: The rather angle of a knee timber; the inner angle in the throat.

B. As adjective: Pertaining to a breech in any of the senses given under A.

breech-bead, s.

Ordnance: The same as breeching, s. (2) (q.v.)

breech-belt, * breche-belt, breh belt, s. A belt or girdle used to sustain the breeches; a waist-belt.

"His breche-belt all tobrast."

Wanderyng of the Hare, 205.

breech-block, s. A movable piece at the breech of a breech-loading gun, which is withdrawn for the insertion of a cartridge and closed before firing, to receive the impact of the recoil. [FIRE-ARM.]

breech-girdle, * breeh gurdel, * breeh-gerdel, * breek girdille, * breg gurdel, * brich gerdel, breh gurdel, bre gurdel, * bri-gurdel, * bry gyr-dyll, s. [Eng. breech, breeche &c. = breech, and girdle.]

1 The same as breech-belt.

Jeremie's breech-gerdel rotede inside the vetere.—Apostate of Inner (ed. Morris), p. 95.

2 The waist, the middle. [BREECHCLOUT.]

breech-loader, s. A fire-arm in which the charge is introduced at the rear instead of at the muzzle. In small arms the barrels may be hinged, or the breech may be opened and closed by means of a movable block of metal; in artillery the breech is closed by a screw or a wedge. The use of breech-loading guns goes back to the sixteenth century; indeed, it is probable that that form of arm is about as old as the muzzle loader. In the modern form, however, it is of quite recent introduction. The Prussian needle-gun, which dates from about 1840, was the first breech-loading rifle used as a military weapon. The soldiers of all European armies now use breech-loaders. [MAGAZINE-RIFLE.]

An older and still more important lesson of the present war is found in the use of breech-loaders and breech-loaders.—Times, Dec 13, 1877.

breech loading, a. Made to be loaded at the breech.

Breech-loading gun or cannon: A gun or cannon made to be loaded at the breech instead of the muzzle.

Breech-loading rifle: A rifle made to be loaded at the breech.

breech-pin, s.

Fire-arms: A plug screwed into the rear end of a barrel, forming the bottom of the charge-chamber. Otherwise called a breech-plug or breech-screw.

breech-screw, s.

Fire-arms: The plug which closes the rear end of the bore of a fire-arm barrel. The parts are known as the plug, the face, the tenon, the tang, and the tang-screw hole.

breech-sight, s.

Fire-arms: The hinder sight of a gun. In conjunction with the front sight it serves to aim the gun at an object. It is graduated to degrees and fractions, their length on the scale being equal to the tangents of an arc having a radius equal to the distance between the front and rear sights. The front sight is merely a short piece of metal screwed into the gun, usually at the muzzle, but sometimes between the trunnions, or on one of the rimbases, with its upper edge parallel to the bore of the gun. The rear sight may be detached, having a semicircular base fitting the base of the gun, or may slide through a slotted lug, and be retained at any given height by a set screw. The breech-sight, the tangent scale, and the pendulum are merely different forms of this device. (Knight.) breech-wrench, s.

Fire-arms: A wrench used in turning out the breech-pin of a fire-arm.

breigh (or as bright), v.t. [From breech, s. (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To put into breeches.

2. To whip upon the breech.

II. Technically:

Of a gun: To fit with a breech; to fasten with breeching (q.v.).

breigned (or as brighed) (Eng.) bricked (Scotch). [BREECHED, I.]

I. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

(1) Wearing, or having on breeches.

But I can perceive that the idea, romantic as it is strongly felt by the then-existent red breeched cross-bowmen who are wanted just now to reinforce the imagined armies of the Emperor.—Bodily Heresy, Sept. 4, 1857.

(2) Put into breeches; hence grown up.

(3) Whipped on the breech. (Beaum. & Fl.)

* 2. Figuratively: Covered, hidden.

There the murderers
Steeped in the colours of their trade, their daggers Unmannerly breech'd with gore.

Shakesp.: Macbeth, iii. 4.

II. Technically:

Of guns: Having a breech.

* breigh-er, s. [Breech; -er.]

1. One who breeches.

2. One who flogs on the breech.

"Penner: A whipper, scourger, breecher."—Cotgrave.

breeches (pron. brigh'-diz), s. pl. [BREECH.]

breeches-bible, s. A name given to a bible printed in 1579, and so called from the reading of Genesis iii. 7: "they sewed fygge-tree leaves together and made themselves breeches." As a matter of fact, this bible has no more distinctive right to the name than Wiclif's version, in which the same words are also found.

breech-ing (or as breigh'-ing), pr. par., a., & s. [BREECH, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

C. As substantive:

II. Technically:

1. Ordnance: A rope secured by a thimble to the breeching-loop of a ship's gun, and attached by its ends to ring-bolts on each side of the port-hole, serving to limit the recoil of the gun when fired. The breeching-loop occupies the place of the ordinary cascabel.

2. Harness: The portion which comes behind the buttocks of a horse, and enables him to hold back the vehicle in descending a hill. It is called also a breech band.

3. Furnace: A bifurcated smoke-pipe or a furnace or heater.

breeching-hook, s.

Vehicles: A loop or hook on the shaft of a carriage for the attachment of the strap of the breeching, by which the horse holds backwardly against the load in descending.

breeching-loop, s.

Ordnance: The eye-bolt of the cascabel in ships' guns, through which the breeching goes to prevent the recoil.

breed, * brede, * bredyn, breede, v.t. & i. [A.S. bredan = to nourish, keep warm; Dut. broeden = to brood, broeijen = (1) to hatch incubate, (2) to brew; O. H. Ger. pruoten; Ger. brüten; Wel. brwd = hot, warm; brwdio = to heat, inflame; Lat. fovere = to cherish, nourish. The word is closely connected with brew (q.v.).]

"The Brehons were, in North Britain and Ireland, the judges appointed by authority to determine, on stated times, all the controversies which happened within their respective districts. Their courts were usually held on the side of a hill, where they were seated on green banks of earth. The hills were called raise-halls. The office belonged to certain families, and was transmitted, like every other inheritance, from father to son. Their stated salaries were farms of considerable value. By the Brehon law, even the most atrocious offenders were not punished with death, imprisonment or exile: but were obliged to pay a fine called Eric. The eleventh or twelfth part of this fine fell to the judge's share: the remainder belonged partly to the King or Superior of the land, and partly to the persons injured; or, if killed, to his relations."—Dr. Abercrombie: Critical Dissertations, D. 13.

(2) The quantity of beer brewed at one operation.

"A brewing of new beer, set by old beer, maketh it work again."—Bacon.

* 2. Fig. : The act of mixing different things together.

"I am not able to avouch anything for certainty, such a brewing and sophistication of it can they make."—Holland.

II. Technically :

1. Liquor manufacture : The art of making beer. This term is also applied to the first operation of the distiller, viz., the extracting of the wort from grain, malt, or any other saccharine substance.

(1) History : According to Herodotus, the Egyptians made wine from barley. The Greeks learned the process from them, and, according to Xenophon, used barley-wine. Tacitus informs us that beer was a common beverage among the Germans, and Pliny adds that it was so among all the nations of Western Europe.

(2) Modern methods of operation : In modern methods of brewing, the brewer is no longer confined to the exclusive use of malt and sugar, but is at liberty to make use of any material capable of being employed in the production of beer. The steadily increasing consumption of beer in the United States has not only revolutionized the manufacturing systems, but has developed brewing into a highly important industry. It is estimated that the yearly consumption of grain and hops in the breweries of the United States is of the value of more than $50,000,000, while the amount of capital invested in the business is very large. Before the year 1862 the tax upon fermented beverages was collected in money at the rate of $1 per barrel. Since then it is collected by means of revenue stamps. The consumption of beer in this country to-day is ten times as great as it was thirty years ago. There are six operations in brewing, viz., grinding or crushing, mashing, boiling, cooling, fermenting, and cleansing.

(i) Grinding : The malt or corn is bruised or crushed by smooth metal rollers, and left in a heap for a few days before brewing, by which it becomes mellow and is more easily exhausted by the water in the mashing.

(ii) Mashing : The crushed or bruised malt is now thrown into the mash-tun, and water added at a temperature of from 158° F. to 172° F. After a maceration of three or four hours, assisted during the first half hour by constant stirring the liquid portion is strained off through finely-perforated plates in the bottom of the mash-tun, into the underback, and pumped into the copper. In mashing, the aim of the brewer is, not only to dissolve out the sugar in the malt, but also to cause the so-called diastase contained in the malt to act on the starch and convert it into sugar. If the heat of the mash-liquor stands below 140° F., the diastase will be inactive; if above 185° F., it is apt to be destroyed. A medium temperature of 165° F. is found to be the most suitable for mashing.

(iii) Boiling : As soon as all the wort is collected in the copper, the hops are added, and the whole boiled for about three hours. The object of boiling is to coagulate and precipitate the excess of albumen present, and to extract the aromatic oil and bitter of the hop.

(iv) Cooling : In order to prevent as much as possible the formation of acid, it is necessary to cool the wort as quickly as possible. This is done by exposing it to a current of air in large shallow vessels, or running it over refrigerating pipes.

(v) Fermenting, or fermentation : As soon as the temperature has fallen to 60° F. the wort is run into the fermenting vats, and yeast added. In about four hours fermentation sets in, and is allowed to continue for forty-eight hours, when the yeast is skimmed off and the beer run into large casks. Fermentation is the most delicate operation of the brewer, and on it chiefly depends the quality and condition of the beer. His aim is not to decompose all the sugar in the wort, but to leave a sufficiency to give body to the beer and keep up the evolution of carbonic acid gas.

(vi) Cleansing : The ordinary practice in cleansing is to run the liquid from the fermenting vats into a series of casks stored with their bung-holes slightly inclined, so that the yeast still generated may pass over into vessels placed to receive it. The object of cleansing is to check the action of the yeast. When sugar is used it is dissolved in the copper. The finished beer varies in specific gravity from 1,002 to 1,090, and contains from four to twenty-four per cent. of proof spirit, together with sugar, called maltose, dextrine, colouring matter, and various salts.

2. Naut. : A collection of dark clouds portending a storm.

brewing tub, s. A tub for brewing.

"... we shall soon have the loan of his cider-press and brewing-tubs for nothing."—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield, ch. xvii.

"Brybery, or brybe. Manticulum."—Prompt. Parv.

2. A reward or consideration of any kind given or offered to any one corruptly, with a view to influence his judgment or conduct.

"Glo. Who can accuse me? wherein am I guilty?
York. 'Tis thought, my lord, that you took bribes of France,
And, being protector, stay'd the soldiers' pay;
By means whereof, his highness hath lost France."
Shakesp. 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1.

† bribe-devouring, a. Eager for bribes.

* bribe-pander, s. One who procures bribes.

† bribe-worthy, a. Worthy of a bribe; worth bribing.

bribe, * brybe, * bry-byn, v.t. & i. [O. Fr. briber.]

A. Transitive:

* 1. To plunder, pillage, rob, or steal.

"Ther is no theef without a lowke
That helpeth hym to wasten and to sowke
Of that he brybe kan, or borwe may."
Chaucer, C. T., 7,417

"Brybyn. Manticulo, latrocinor."—Prompt. Parv.

2. To give or offer to any person a reward or consideration of any kind, with a view to influence his judgment or conduct; to hire for a corrupt purpose; to secure a vote by illegal or corrupt means.

"Or would it be possible to bribe a juryman or two to starve out the rest.—Macaulay. Hist. Eng., ch. xxii.

3. To influence or bring over to one's side in any way.

"How powerful are chaste vows! the wind and tide
You bribed to combat on the English side."
Dryden.

B. Intrans.: To offer or give bribes.

"The lord may supplicate, but cannot bribe."
Prologue to Gil and Saturd Man.

† bribe'-a-ble, bri-ba-ble, a. [Eng. bribe; and able.] Capable of being bribed; open to a bribe.

"Can any one imagine a more dangerous and more bribable class of electors?"—Edmunds. Polish Corruption, c. 5.

† bri'-bēe, s. [Bribe, s.] One who receives a bribe.

"... were scheduled as bribees without being examined."—The Beacon Libration. Times, March 20, 1874.

† bribe'-less, a. [Eng. bribe, and suff. -less.] Free from bribes; incapable of being bribed.

* brib-ən, v.t. or i. [Bribe, v.]

brib'-ər, * brib-our, * bryb-our, * bryb-oure, * brey-bowre, s. [O. Fr. bribeur = a beggar, a scrap-craver, also a greedy devourer; briber = to beg; and this from bribe = (1) a lump of bread given to a beggar (Cotgr.), (2) a present, a gift, bribia (anc. MSS.) = bullet; from Welsh briw = a morsel a fragment.]

* 1. A thief, robber, plunderer

"Alle othere in bataille beoth yholde brybbours, Pilours and pyke-herneys, in eche parabe a-cerasele."
Langland: P. Plowman, xxiii. 263.

"Who saveth a thef when the rope is knet,
With some false turne the bribour will him quite."
Lydgate.

* 2. A low, beggariy fellow.

"That pedder bryb-our, that schelp-keiper,
He telles thame alk ane cauk by cauk."
Bannatyne Poems, p. 171, st. 7.

3. One who offers or gives bribes.

* 4. He who or that which in any way influences or tries to influence corruptly or wrongfully.

"Affection is still a bribber of the judgment; and it is hard for a man to admit a reason against the thing he loves; or to confess the force of an argument against an interest."—Bacon.

brib'-ər-y, * bri-bər-ie, * bryb'-ər-y, s. [Eng. bribe; -ry.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. Robbery, theft, plunder. [See quotation under Bribe, s., 1.]

2. The act or practice of bribing, or of giving or offering bribes; the act of receiving bribes.

"For the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery."—Job xv. 34.

II. Law: Bribery by a candidate or any agent of his at a parliamentary or municipal election voids the seat acquired through its aid. If it has been practised by the aspirant himself it incapacitates him from being elected again for a number of years. The extensive prevalence of bribery may be punished by the temporary or permanent disfranchisement of the corrupt place. Despite all efforts to prevent it bribery at elections is frequently practised, and there is every reason to believe that legislation is largely influenced by bribery of members of Councils and Legislatures, if not of Congress. The laws against this crime are stringent and the penalties severe, but it is very difficult to produce conviction of the offense.

brib'-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [Bribe, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive: The act of giving or offering a bribe, bribery.

bric-à-brac (à as ą), s & a. [Fr.]

A. As subst.: Fancy ware, curiosities, knick-knacks.

"I've no taste for bric-à-brac."—Cornhill Mag., Jan., 1867, p. 117.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or containing curiosities, knick-knacks, &c.

"The old china, the lace and glass, were all for sale. In fact, the chief show-house in Brock was a bric-à-brac shop. Finally, she took us into a room and introduced us to 'Mign Vader'."—Daily Telegraph, Jan. 5, 1866.

* briche, * bruche, s. [Breach, s.] A breach, rupture

* briche, * bryche, a. [A.S. brice, bryce = fragile.] Weak

"Now ye Pers bycome bryche, That er was bothe stoute and ryche."
Robert of Brunne

* bricht, * bryght (ch guttural), a. & s. (Scot.) [Bright.]

* Used substantively for a young woman, strictly as conveying the idea of beauty.

"Wallace hyr saw, as he his syne can cast,
The prent off luff him punyeit at the last,
So suprely, throuch bewte off that brycht,
With gret wund in presence tuk he nycht."
Wallace, v. 647, MS.

brick (1), * brique, s. & a. [O. Fr. brique = (1) a fragment, (2) a brick; O. Dut. brick, bricke = a fragment, bit; brick, brijck = a tile, brick. Compare A.S. brice, bryce = brittle, a breaking, from breotan = to break.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A mass of clay and sand, tempered and burnt in a kiln, made in a rectangular shape, and used in building. [II. 2.]

"Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather straw to themselves."—Exod., v. 7.

"Not brick was made but some man had to think of the making of that brick."—Carlyle. Heroes and Hero-worship, lect. v.

(2) Bricks collectively, as a material

"Augustus was accustomed to boast that he had found his capital of brick, and that he had left it of marble."—Gibbon: Decline & Fall, i. 44.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A species of loaf, so called from its shape somewhat resembling a brick. It is applied to bread of different sizes: as, a penny brick, a three-penny brick, a quarter brick, i.e. a quartern loaf.

"... a penny brick, on which we made a comfortable meal."—Smollett, Roderick Random.

(2) A good fellow. (Colloquial.)

"He's a dear little brick."—Thackeray.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A moulded and burned block of tempered clay. The word is also applied to the block in its previous conditions, as a moulded plastic mass, and as a dried block in which the water, hygrometrically combined with the clay, is driven off. When this condition is accepted as a finality, the block so dried is an adobe. The burning of the previously dried brick drives off the chemically combined water, and for ever changes the character of the mass. An adobe may become re-saturated with water, and resume its plasticity; a brick may become rotten and disintegrated, but not plastic. Arch-brick is an arch-grating the size of a brick, or a perforated brick, let into a wall to allow the passage of air. Arch-brick usually means the hard-burned, partially vitrified brick from the arches of the brick-clamp in which the fire is made and maintained. A brick made voussoir-shaped is known as a compass-brick. A coping-brick is one for the upper course of a wall. Clinker, a brick from an arch of the clamp, so named from the sharp glassy sound when struck; a coping-brick, one for a coping course on a wall; feather-edged brick, a prismatic form, for arches, vaults, flues, etc.; fire-brick, made of intractable material, so as to resist fusion in furnaces and kilns; hollow brick, with openings for ventilation; stock, a name given to the best class of bricks, and also locally to peculiar varieties, as gray-stocks, red-stocks, etc. Perking, place, or-mel, semel brick, are local terms applied to imperfectly burned or refuse brick. Bricks vitrified by excessive heat are termed burr bricks or burrs. (Knight.)

2. Hist.: Bricks were manufactured at a remote period of antiquity by the Egyptians, the Babylonians, the Assyrians, &c., and some of them being inscribed with written characters have been of priceless value in conveying historic facts to the present age. About A.D. 44 bricks were made in England by the Romans, and in A.D. 880 by the Anglo-Saxons under King Alfred. Under Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth the manufacture greatly flourished. The size was regulated by Charles I. in 1625.

BRICKS.

3. Her. Arch.: A brick represented as a bent bow, but showing its thickness in perspective.

B. As adjective: Pertaining to bricks or brickwork brick-axe, s.

BRICK-AXE.

Bricklaying: An axe with two ends, which are presented like chisels. It is used in chopping off the soffits of bricks to the saw-kerfs, which have been previously made in the brick to the required depth, in order to prevent the brick from spalling brick-bat, s. [Brickbat.]

brick-built, a. Built or constructed of brick.

"Yet, enter'd in the brick-built town, he try'd."
Bergalon Jour. Bud., 10.

brick-burner, s. One whose trade or occupation it is to superintend the burning of bricks in the kiln.

brick-clamp, s. A stack of bricks in order for burning.

brick-clay, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: Clay used for making brick.

"I observed it in pits wrought for tile and brick-clay." —Woodward.

2. Geol.: The term brick-clay occurs frequently in descriptions of Scottish geology, whilst the term used for the somewhat similar deposits in the valley of the Thames is brick-earth, or the pl. brick-earths (q.v.). Most of the Scottish brick-clays are of inter-glacial age, and some of them enclose arctic shells. Brick-clays, of excellent quality, are very abundant in many parts of the United States, and the city of Philadelphia is built upon a broad deposit of such material, the result, it is believed, of the grinding of rocks to clay during the glacial age.

brick-colour, brick colour, s. & a.

A. As subst.: The colour of brick. [B.]

B. As adj.: Dull scarlet mixed with grey.

brick-dryer, s. An oven in which green bricks are dried, so as to fit them for building up in clamps or kilns for burning. A series of drying-chambers are separated from each other by iron-folding doors, through which chambers a railroad track is laid. Under one end of the structure is a furnace, and hot air, of increasing degrees of temperature, is introduced successively into the separate chambers. (Knight.) brick-dust, brickdust, s. Dust made or arising from pounded bricks. (Lit. & fig.)

"This ingenious author, being thus sharp set, got together a convenient quantity of brickdust, and disposed of it into several papers." —Spectator brick-earth, s.

1. Ordinary Language: Earth used for brick-making.

2. Geology:

(1) The term is sometimes used in the singular.

"From the sub-aërial conditions under which the brick-earth was formed."—Q. J. Geol. Soc., xlii. 65.

(2) Pl. (brick-earths): A term specially used of two beds or series of beds, the Upper and the Lower Brick-earths. The names were given by Mr. Searles Wood, jun., q.v. The latter are especially interesting. They exist near London at Ilford, Gray's Thurrock, Crayford, Erith, and Wickham. Besides freshwater and terrestrial shells, &c., they contain no fewer than twenty-four species of mammals, among others the Wolf (Canis lupus), the Beaver (Castor fiber), and the Wild Cat (Felis catus), a fossil horse (Equus fossilis), a Hyæna (Hyæna spelæa), and yet more remarkable Elephas antiquus, primigenius and priscus, Rhinoceros tichorhinus, leptorhinus and megarhinus, and Hippopotamus major. Prof. Boyd Dawkins considers them Pleistocene and Pre-glacial. He believes that in a descending order the following is the sequence of the several beds:—(1) Post-glacial deposits, climate severe, but gradually becoming temperate; (2) Glacial deposits, climate severe; (3) Lower Brick-earths of Thames Valley, climate comparatively temperate; (4) Forest bed of Norfolk, climate temperate. (Q. J. Geol. Soc., xxiii. (1867) 91 bis.) Mr. Searles Wood, jun., on some points differs from Prof. Boyd Dawkins. (Ibid., 304-417.)

brick-elevator, s. An apparatus for raising materials used in construction. Endless chains are carried over wheels above and below, and the material is carried up on boxes supported by frames attached to the chains.

brick-field, s. A field in which bricks are made.

"The newer deposits of the brick-field."—Q. J. Geol. Soc., xix. 94.

brick furnace, s. A furnace for burning bricks. In Hoffmann's annular brick-furnace there is a central chimney and removable divisions for separating the annulus into different chambers. These are filled and emptied through doors. The chambers being charged with brick, heat is applied to one chamber, and the volatile material thence resulting is led through the next one, so as to heat and dry the bricks in the next in series. The bricks in chamber one being burned, the fire is applied to number two, and so on to the end.

brick-kiln, s. [Brickkiln.]

brick-layer, s. [Bricklayer.]

brick-machine, s. A machine for making bricks. Many such machines exist diverse in type from each other, patents for their construction in the aggregate amounting to hundreds, having been taken out in England or in the United States. In one of these, a patent clay-tempering and brick-making machine, invented in 1831 by Mr. Bakewell, of Manchester, the clay, after being tempered, is compressed into the proper form by a combination of levers. By Messrs. Cooke and Cunningham's machinery 1,800 bricks can be made in an hour. The making of bricks by hand is vanishing in the United States in consequence of the rapid and effective work done by machines. These machines are capable of turning out from 10,000 to 30,000 bricks in ten hours, varying considerably in their capacity and also in the quality of the work performed.

brick-maker, s. [Brickmaker.]

brick-making, s. The operations of brick-making may be said to consist in—Preparing the brick-earth, tempering, moulding, drying, and burning. The qualities of bricks may be thus enumerated:—Soundness, that is, freedom from cracks and flaws; hardness, to enable them to withstand pressure and strain; regularity of shape and size, to enable them to occupy their proper place in the course; infusibility, in those intended for furnace-work. Fire-bricks are made from a compound of silica and alumina, and the clay owes its refractory quality to the absence of lime, magnesia, potash, and metallic oxides, which act as fluxes. Hollow bricks are made for purposes of warming, ventilating, and removing moisture from the wall. In some cases the hollows form flues, or shafts for ventilation, or discharge of dust from the upper stories. In other cases the hollows have no mechanical function other than to form air-chambers for warmth, as it is well known that an imprisoned body of air is a very poor conductor of heat. (Knight.)

"... A dark greyish-blue clay worked for brick-making."—Q. J. Geol. Soc., xxxiv 238.

† brick-mason, s. A bricklayer. (Ogilvie.) brick-mould, s. A box in which clay for bricks is moulded into shape. It is sometimes of wood lined with iron or brass; sometimes it is made of sheet-iron in four pieces, rivetted together at the angles, and strengthened with wood at the sides only.

brick-moulder, s. One who moulds bricks.

brick-nogging, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

Building: Brick and stud work. [B.]

B. As adjective: Consisting of brick and stud work.

¶ A brick-nogging wall or partition is one in which the spaces between the timbers or scantling are filled up with brick laid in mortar. In a brick-nogging partition the wooden portions are called nogging-pieces.

BRICK-NOGGING WALL.

brick-pit, s. A pit from which bricks are dug.

"The brick-pit at London is situated . . ."—Q. J. Geol. Soc., xix. (1863).

brick-press, s. A kind of brick-machine, which effects its object by compressing the bricks into shape. [Brick-machine.]

brick-red, s. A reddish colour, like that of bricks. (Used also attributively.)

brick-tea, s. The larger leaves, refuse twigs and dust of the tea plant, softened and moulded into a brick-like mass for easier transportation from China to Russia.

brick-trimmer, s. [Trimmer.]

Arch.: A brick arch abutting against a wooden trimmer in front of a fire-place, to guard against accidents by fire.

BRICK-TRIMMER.

brick-trowel, s. [Trowel.] A trowel used by bricklayers.

brick-truck, s. A truck with wide tires to travel over the flat surface of the brick-yard in moving bricks from the hack to the kiln.

A. As subst.: A wall of brick.

B. As adj.: Consisting of such a wall.

"And they, that never pass their brick-wall bounds,
To range the fields, and treat their lungs with air."
Cowper: The Task, bk. iv.

brick-work, s.

Bricklaying: Work executed in brick. The standard size for English brick is 9 × 4½ × 2½ inches, and walls are described as half-brick, brick, brick and a half, &c., in thickness. The outer walls of modern houses are generally brick or brick and a half thick, the system of leases for ninety-nine years having given rise to the practice of building houses only sufficiently strong to last till the lease falls in.

brick-wise, a. or adv. Arranged like bricks in a wall; so laid that the joints do not come immediately over each other.

brick-yard, s. A "yard" or enclosure, or simply a place where bricks are made.

* brick (2), s. [Corruption of break, s. (7).]

Brick of land: A division, a portion distinguished from other portions.

"The bricks of land underwritten, viz., that brick of land lyand north and south."—Acts Part. James V., vii., p. 316. (Jamieson.) brick, v.t. [From brick, s. (q.v.).]

Building:

1. To lay or construct with bricks.

"The sexton comes to know where he is to be laid, and whether his grave is to be plain or bricked."—Swift.

2. To imitate or counterfeit a brick-wall by smearing a wall with red ochre, cutting divisions in it, and filling the latter with plaster.

brick'-bat, s. [From Eng. brick, and bat (1), s.] A broken piece of brick.

"Earthen bottles, filled with hot water, do provoke in bed a sweat more daintily than brickbats hot."—Bacon.

brick'-ing, s. [Brick, s.] The imitation of brickwork on a plastered or stuccoed surface.

brick'-kiln, * bricke-kill, s. [Eng. brick, and kiln.] A chamber in which green bricks are loosely stacked, with spaces between them for the passage of the heat, and in which they are burned by fires placed either in arched furnaces under the floor of the kiln, or in fire-holes placed in the side walls.

brick'-lāy-ĕr, s. [Eng. brick, and layer.] A man whose trade it is to lay or set bricks.

"In the course of a hundred and twenty years, the daily earnings of the bricklayer have risen from half a crown to four and tenpence."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

bricklayer's-hammer, s.

Bricklaying: A tool having a hammer-head and a sharpened peen, forming an axe for dressing bricks to shape.

bricklayer's-hoist, s. A winch and tackle for lifting bricks and mortar in building.

bricklayer's-itch, s.

Med.: A disease to which bricklayers are subject, caused by the particles of brick-dust entering the skin and producing great irritation.

bricklayer's-labourer, s. A labourer who assists the bricklayer by supplying him with bricks, mortar, &c.

bricklayer's-trowel, s. [BRICK-TROWEL.]

brick lāy-ing, s. [Eng. brick, and laying.] The art or trade of building with bricks, or of laying or setting bricks.

"Who is to judge how much cotton-spinning, or distributing goods from the stores, or bricklaying or chimney-sweeping is equivalent to so much plough ing?" —J. S. Mill: Political Economy (ed. 1848), vol. i., bk. ii., ch. i., § 3, p. 240.

¶ The implements of the bricklayer are a trowel, for spreading mortar and breaking bricks when a piece smaller than a whole brick is required; a hammer, for making openings in the brick-work and for driving or dividing bricks, for which purposes one end is formed like a common hammer, and the other is broad and flattened, somewhat after the manner of an axe; the plumb-rule, made generally of wood, having a longitudinal open ing down its middle and a plummet suspended from its upper end, for carrying walls up perpendicularly; the level, consisting of a long horizontal arm, having a perpendicular branch carrying a vertical arm from which a plummet is suspended; a large square, for laying out the sides of a building at right angles; a rod, usually five or ten feet long, for measuring lengths; compasses, for traversing arches and vaults; a line and line-pins, for keeping the courses straight and level as the work progresses; and a hod, for carrying bricks and mortar to the workman. (Knight.)

* bric-kle-nēss, s. [O. Eng. brickle; -ness.] The quality of being brickle or fragile brittleness. (Barret.) brick-le, * bric-kle, * br ·el, bre-kle, bru-kel, * bru-kle, a. [O. Dut. brokel = fragile, brittle. A.S. bricc, brycc = brittle, brecan = to break.]

1. Lit.: Brittle, fragile, easily broken.

"The parke oke is the softest, and far more quait and brickle than the hedge oke."—Harrison: England, p. 221.

"But th' Altare, on the which this Image staid, Was O great pitie! built of brickle clay."
Spenser: Ruins of Time, 466-8.

2. Fig.: Fickle, variable, uncertain, unsteady.

"The brickle and variable doctrine of John Calvin in his Institutions."—Anapleion: Poetrum of the Patch (1588), f. 24, b.

"... when I think how I am to fend for ye now in these brickle times."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. vii.

brick'-mā-ker, s. [Eng. brick; maker.] One whose trade it is to make bricks.

"They are common in claypits, but the brickmakers fix them out of the clay."—Woodward.

brick-māk-ing, a. & s. [BRICK-MAKING.]

brickmaking-machine, s. A machine for making bricks. [BRICK-MACHINE.]

brick-nōg-ging, s. [BRICK-NOGGING.]

brick wŏrk, s. [BRICK-WORK.]

* brick-y, a. [Eng. brick; -y.] Full of or composed of bricks. (Cotgrave.) bri-cōl', * bri-cōl'e, s. [Fr. bricole.]

Military:

1. Harness for men employed in dragging heavy guns, when horses, &c., cannot be used or procured.

2. A species of engine of war, the same as a springold.

(2) To throw, throw a bridge behind one:

Mil.: To do as described with the view of preventing an enemy from following. It has the additional effect of preventing one's self from easily retreating again across the water. (Ld. & B.)

"He had broken down all the bridges behind him. He had been so close to the side that he must of necessity be true to the other." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A structure consisting of an arch or series of arches supporting a roadway above it, designed to unite the two banks of a river or the two sides of an open space.

(1) History of bridges: Bridges seem to have existed in China from a period of considerable antiquity. The word bridge does not occur in the authorised version of the Bible. Temporary bridges, for military purposes, were constructed before permanent structures for the convenience of the inhabitants were erected. The former were often of boats. Thus Cyrus constructed such bridges about 536 B.C., Darius Hystaspes about 490, and Xerxes about 480 B.C. Bridges of stone or brick seem to have been first used by the Romans, there were none erected in Greece till after the Roman conquest. The first Roman bridge is said to have been one spanning the Tiber between the Janiculum and the Aventine Mountain, built by or under Ancus Martius. Now they are universal in properly-civilised countries, though in countries of imperfect civilisation even yet they are few. In India they are not numerous, and most of those which exist have been erected since the occupation of the country by the British. London Bridge, in its oldest form, existed about A.D. 978, a new one was built of wood in 1014, yet another in 1209, and the present structure was completed in 1831. Old Westminster Bridge was opened in 1750, old Blackfriars in 1769, &c. In the United States bridge building has become a highly developed art, and numerous magnificent examples of it are to be seen. Of the Suspension Bridge, the most striking instance is that over the East River at New York. Of the newly adopted Truss Bridge system, Philadelphia has several fine examples, while of the Cantilever Bridges that at St. Louis is considered probably the finest specimen of bridge construction in the world.

(2) Construction and parts of a modern bridge: A bridge is generally made of wood, of iron, of stone, or of brick. The extreme supports of the arches at the two ends are called butments or abutments; the solid parts between the arches piers, and the fences on the sides of the road or pathway parapets.

(3) Different kinds of bridges: Among these may be mentioned a bascule-bridge, a boat-bridge or bridge of boats, a bowstring bridge, a box bridge, a drawbridge, a floating-bridge, a flying bridge, a foot-bridge, a furniture-bridge, a lattice-bridge, a lattice-bridge, a pontoon-bridge, a suspension bridge, a swing-bridge, a truss-bridge, a tubular bridge, a wire-bridge. (See these words.)

2. Ship-building: A platform deck extending from side to side of a vessel amidships. It is common in steam vessels, affording a convenient station for the officer in command, and extends over the space between the paddle-boxes. It is also known as the hurricane deck or bridge deck.

3. Mining: The platform or staging by which ore, limestone, fuel, &c., are conveyed to the mouth of a smelting furnace.

4. Metallurgy, furnaces, boilers, &c.:

(1) A lower vertical partition at the back of the grate space of a furnace. [WATER-BRIDGE, Hawksley's patent.]

(2) The middle part of the fire-bars in a marine boiler, on either side of which the fires are banked. (Admiral Smyth.)

(3) The low wall of division between the fuel-chamber and hearth of a reverbertory furnace.

(4) The wall at the end of the hearth towards the stack, compelling the caloric current in puddling to ascend and then descend towards the foot of the stack.

5. Music: A thin wooden bar placed beneath the strings of a musical instrument to elevate them above the sounding-board and to terminate at one end their vibrating portion. The tone of an instrument is largely influenced by the position of the bridge.

6. Ordnance: The pieces of timber between the transoms of a gun-carriage.

7. Harmony: A piece raised in the middle and fastened at both ends to the watch-plate, and forming a bearing for one or more pivots. When supported at one end it is a cock.

8. Engraving: A board resting on end-cleats, used by an engraver to span the plate on which he is working, to support the hand clear of the plate.

9. Electricity: A device used for measuring the resistance of an element of an electric circuit. [ELECTRIC BRIDGE.]

B. As adjective: Pertaining to a bridge in any of the foregoing senses.

bridge-board, s.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between brightness, lustre, splendour, and brilliancy: "Brightness is the generic, the rest are specific: there cannot be lustre, splendour, or brilliancy without brightness. But there may be brightness where these do not exist. The terms rise in sense; lustre rises above splendour or lustre, and brilliancy above both. Brightness and lustre are applied to natural lights; splendour and brilliancy have been more commonly applied to that which is artificial: there is always more or less brightness in the sun or moon; there is sometimes lustre in all the heavenly bodies when they shine in their unclouded . . . . . ; splendour in the eruptions of a volcano or an immense collection of lights; brilliancy in a collection of objects. . . . may be both splendid and . . . . . all-animation the splendour arises from the mass and richness of light; the . . . . . from the variety and brightness of the . . . and colours. Brightness may be . . . lustre may be tarnished, splendour and brilliancy diminished. The analogies . . . preserved in the figurative application. . . . attaches to the moral character of . . . ordinary cases, lustre attaches to . . . instances of virtue and goodness . . . and brilliancy attach to the achievements of men. Our Saviour is strikingly represented to us as the brightness of His Father's . . . and the express image of his person. . . . humanity of the English . . . the Lord's quest adds a lustre to the . . . which are either splendid or brilliant, according to the number and nature of the circumstances which render them remarkable."
